COMPOSED FOR BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA.

> BY J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc.

Paper cover, 18. "It is a scholarly piece of work for chorus and baritone solo (Mr. King), well written for the voices, and full of excellent counterpoint, occasionally relieved by flowing melody. Dr. Bridge was warmly applauded."—The Times.

"By his setting of the Latin hymn, the organist of Westminster Abbey has taken a decided step forward, and has warranted amateurs in halling himas another vindicator of native talent."—Daily Telegraph.

"A hearty recall complimented the composer upon an able work well performed."—Standard. "The writing is musicianly throughout, and in parts really bold and striking; it is scored, moreover, with a breadth and richness that prove Dr. Bridge to be a master of the resources of his art."—Sunday Times.

CO-OPERATION IN MUSIC

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

It is somewhat late in the day to enlarge upon cooperation as a principle in human affairs, and it does not come within the province of this paper to argue the relative advantages of co-operation and competition. The two elsewhere opposing practices may be regarded for my present purpose but one, since there can be no form of musical competition that is not tantamount to a working together in the cause of art. When, therefore, I use the word co-operation it must be taken in the larger sense just indicated, and as meaning, in fact, association for no matter what immediate artistic end. We English are, in some respects, a people given to association. It is true that, in other respects, we are fond of isolation. We love to dwell in houses of our own, the front door of which we can shut and keep the world out, if so we please. We are constitutionally suspicious of strangers, and resentful of intrusion upon the personal privacy which we well know how to maintain, even in the midst of a crowd. Indeed, the adage "Mind your own business" has, with us, the force of an authorised addition to the Decalogue. But while thus asserting a right to isolate ourselves when there is nothing to be gained by mixing with our fellows, we are of all people, perhaps, the most gregarious for profitable ends. The whole land is covered with associations devoted to innumerable purposes, from the keeping a common home, called a club, to the protecting of a vast industry under the name of a trade union. None can tell how much England owes to the spirit underlying her multitudinous societies. It has given to one the force of many: made the helpless strong with the strength of the helpful, and confronted unscrupulous power with a banded might. But the development of the principle of co-operation is, after all, not universal. There are still classes capable of being described, in Lord Beaconsfield's words, as a "fortuitous concourse of atoms"—so many sand-grains lying close together without cohesion. We find this particularly in the sphere of music.

Assuming the comparative isolation of musical people to be a fact-will anyone dispute it?-it would be interesting to inquire into reasons; profitable also, perhaps, since the cause may be removable. "May be!" some one ejaculates, with impatience, if not contempt. His quick mind has gone at once to the fountain of origin, and sees in the jealousy and abnormal sensitiveness of the musical nature a source which can never dry up. It is vain, I know, to put one's solitary testimony against the evidence of the universal voice, and that mighty organ long ago declared the followers of the divine art to be the most quarrelsome and, as regards common ends, the most incapable of men. There is, I grieve to say, much that supports the verdict. The conflicts of Tweedledum and Tweedledee are being eternally fought out, fed with men and motives by the consciousness of an individuality which some one has rubbed against and made sore. Of course this is no mystery to session of a keen emotionalism which quickly responds to every appeal. He whose nature is pachydermitous, like the body of a rhinoceros, can never be a musician, though he may master the mechanism of an instrument and mechanically play it. Hence the phenomena at which, sometimes, all the world

But that which is natural in man is not necessarily a controlling power. Most of us know how to conquer ourselves when the object to be gained is something outside of and above us. How often, for example, has the love of woman turned an ordinary man into a hero in the struggle with himself, enabling him to subdue his passions and purify his soul, even as she whom he worships is pure? May not a love of art lead to the same end in the measure of its intensity? Sooth to say, the man devoted to music cannot be a mischief-maker in the temple of his idol. The very idea of devotion implies a sacrifice of self whenever individual interests and those of the person or principle which has inspired it chance to clash. Why, then, should we accept, as a foregone conclusion, the impossibility of musical co-operation in the completest form? Community of feeling can bring the most opposite natures into harmony, just as, when death threatens alike the wolf and the lamb, those creatures stand trembling side by side with no thought of devouring or being devoured. Thus, exceptions apart, we may measure the genuine musical sentiment of a district by the degree of cordiality with which those who profess it come together for the good of the art they love.

Supposing that the devotedness just referred to abounded amongst us vastly more than it does, what might be the practical outcome? In other words, what could be done that now seems impossible, or, at any rate, remains unattempted? I would rather put the question in this way: What might not be done? But let me confine my remarks within moderate limits, and point out the immensity of good open to the now isolated musical bodies with which our land is covered. It is often said that within the bounds of any given place may be found more musical societies than can properly support themselves. So with religious bodies, and yet, somehow, the agencies at work on the side of God are not in excess of those requisite to check the forces of the devil. I, for one, should be loth to restrict the freedom with which musical professors and amateurs multiply the temples and schools of their art. Each separate "cause" is an embodiment either of artistic enthusiasm or of the self-interest which, in working out its own ends, serves also a higher purpose. The more enthusiasm the better. Like Hannibal's vinegar, it is a powerful solvent, and has melted many an Alpine range stretching across the path of progress. But enthusiasm, as all experience goes to prove, flourishes less in the great mass where few can be leaders, than in detachments, where a sense of personal responsibility and possible distinction can be distributed amongst many. Nevertheless, minute subdivision of musical effort, useful in some important respects, is an evil in others, and needs to be accompanied by a corrective. In the absence of modifying circumstances it tends to narrowness of view, restriction of sympathies, and feebleness of action. Like results flow from a similar cause in all departments of human association. Some of the mountainous districts of Scotland contain companies of Volunteer Infantry so isolated by distance and difficult communication that they parade together as a battalion but once a year. observant people. Swift wrote, "Strange such difference should be"; but, in truth, it is not strange at all. A man cannot be musical without being also sensitive. His capacity for music lies in the possible that they never so paraded at all, but remained isolated companies to the end of the chapter; what then? The answer is, that beside being but half taught, they would have no consciousness of military strength, no experience of from various parts of the kingdom, and submitting the larger operations of the field, and, outside a small circle, no power of adaptability to warlike circumstances. So must it be, mutatis mutandis, with small musical bodies that remain detached, and pursue nothing higher than the objects attainable by whether anything can be done to secure for these scattered companies an exercise analagous to battalion drill.

In Wales, the Eisteddfod supplies a means to this end-I mean the institution as a whole, not merely the annual gathering distinguished as the Eisteddfod Royal and National. Eisteddfodau are plentiful in the Principality. Every county, almost every town, has its own special gathering, at which the various choirs of the place or district meet for competitive purposes, sometimes for combined performances. Here, then, we find a simple and old-established machinery doing the very work upon which I now lay stress. Is it rash to suppose that the excellence of the Welsh as choralists arises, in large measure, from the persistent stimulus of Eisteddfod meetings? Surely not. The alliance between effect and cause is too natural for mistake. It may, of course, be said that the Welsh confine their efforts in musical culture to a restricted circle, but the remark has no bearing upon the point I desire to establish, especially as the reasons for it are peculiarly local. The main thing is that, in Wales, we see cooperation and association in various forms, accompanied by keen musical interest, wide-spread culture of a certain kind, and very remarkable executive ability. How can we obtain the same advantages for England?

It is hopeless to think of transplanting the Eisteddfod across the Marches. That peculiar institution would not flourish on Saxon soil. But the principle of competition is as much English as Welsh, and I see no reason in the nature of English things why musical competitions should not take root and flourish as well as those concerned with manly sports, literary attainments, cattle-breeding, and window-gardening. It may be said that matters of art do not excite among our public the degree of personal interest which attends concerns of a more material character. That is so, undoubtedly; but unless we are to understand that English people are incapable of enthusiasm in matters of art-absit omen-the observation only goes to show that we have not cultivated ourselves up to the requisite point. But about the truth of even this extent of demonstration I am incredulous. It is absurd to suppose that there is not in England an amount of artistic cultivation-I am not contending for its diffusion in the Welsh degree-more than sufficient to feed the fire of competitive gatherings. The real fact is that we are slow to take up with new ideas and practices, and even with novel applications of old ones. Also must be considered the large measure of personal feeling-overweening ambition, jealousy, and the like-which tends to interfere with the harmonious association of musical people. This, as I have endeavoured to prove, decreases in proportion as a real love of art increases, but there it is at present, and forms an unavoidable element in the

We have lately witnessed an attempt at musical association for competitive purposes, made under the auspices of the Inventions Exhibition. The affair in its preparatory stages seems to have been ill-managed, and the results cannot, therefore, be accepted as fully representing what might have followed upon more perfect arrangements. But they were, to some extent, satisfactory. At any rate, they demonstrated the feasibleness of bringing musical societies together establishing a national repute.

them to a process which, by the feelings it excites, and the stimulus it gives, is bound to exercise a healthy influence. I would spread the system exemplified at the Albert Hall over the entire land, and see every county organised for the purpose of carrylimited strength. Hence an important question arises ing it out. A plan akin to that of the National Riffe Association might be adopted with advantage. In that case, any county association so minded affiliates itself with the central body by payment of a small subscription; the central body, on its part, re-serving certain prizes for the best shots among the men who have carried off honours on the county ranges. If, following this model, we had local associations in the provinces, the successful choirs might compete in London for the supreme distinction, and thus an increasing stimulus would be supplied in the interest of better taste and executive skill. It is not necessary that every meeting should devote itself to competition exclusively. The affiliated societies might gather for a combined performance of works which had been. sectionally studied. Here, happily, we find a working model in English musical life. I refer to the many Diocesan Choral Associations which, precisely in the way now suggested, are doing admirable service on behalf of church music. It must be admitted that the bodies in question are setting all other musical societies a splendid example of energy and concord, which may yet develop and bear even greater fruit. I need not go into details respecting their method of working, since that is well known. As for its effect upon the individual choirs, the intelligent reader can form an opinion for himself, after reflecting upon the varied incentives, technical and moral, which the diocesan gatherings and the preparations they involve, must of necessity supply. Thus furnished with what the English mind so dearly loves - a precedent, the lay societies can find no reason in distrust of new ideas why they should not devise some form of co-operation such as would utilise the banded strength of bodies individually weak. I know that this cannot be done with a stamp of the foot, or a mere mental volition. There must be an expenditure of time, money, and personal energy: there are prejudices to be conquered, and all manner of difficulties, real and imaginary, to be smoothed away. But these things never yet stopped Englishmen whose hearts were in their work, though they have given lukewarmness ample excuse for crying "Lo, a lion in the path." The Diocesan Choral Associations must have been built up with infinite pains and tact, and what has been done in one department of musical activity can certainly be accomplished in another. I have put the case of co-operation for musical purposes without any attempt to work out details better left to those who, in different parts of the country, may endeavour to carry the idea into practical effect. The main point is to get the idea familiarised and accepted; that done, a start may be expected towards the goal long since reached by Germany in the combination of her singing societies. I was once in Hamburgh during a meeting of the male-voice choirs, and have not forgotten, nor shall I ever forget, the spectacle presented. have heard better singing than that of the 7,000 men gathered from all parts of Germany; but no such enthusiasm, no such enterprise, devotion, and even sacrifice in the cause of art, had entered into my dreams. It will be a good day for English music when its votaries approximate thereto. The art of music will then be established as a popular art, and the capacity of the nation enlisted in the task of

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE.

THE remarks which we offered to our readers on this subject in the August number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, partaking mainly of the character of a review of what had been achieved outside the Metropolis in the way of educating the masses, we are desirous in the present issue of supplementing them by some further comments and suggestions. And if our treatment of the subject shall seem fragmentary and discursive, the nature of the movement itself, consisting of so many isolated and detached efforts, may be alleged in partial excuse thereof. Could these numerous and admirable organisations, metropolitan and provincial, be once linked together for mutual assistance and advice, we are firmly convinced that several of the difficulties which beset the movement might be considerably abated, if not surmounted. One of the chief of these, as we have already pointed out, is the geographical difficulty. Those thorough-going and self-sacrificing reformers, who hold that no effort to develop the artistic tastes of the people is complete unless it reaches the lowest levels, have long since realised that in order to bring music home to the dwellers in the slums, it is necessary to go amongst them. The very rich and the very poor live almost side by side in London, and many of the latter pass months and years of their lives without ever issuing forth from the squalid alleys or courts, where they dwell and die in ignorance, not only of all the sights and sounds of the country, but of the beauties of London itself. This abrupt contrast of wealth and misery; this conscious withdrawal of poverty from the regions of fashion, is one of the strangest and saddest mysteries of our capital, and it is not without its bearing on the subject in hand. For leaving the East End of London out of consideration, we believe that were a generous philanthropist to organise a series of Free Concerts in, say, St. James's Hall, it would be very doubtful whether they would be attended by the class most in need of such entertainment. But beside the poor who live on the skirts of the rich without giving proofs of their existence, so far as the dwellers in Mayfair, Belgravia, and South Kensington are concerned, there are those who are separated by vast distances from the benevolent workers who toil for their enlightenment. Now the exertion of providing entertainments would certainly be diminished, and the means of educating popular audiences concurrently developed by the establishment of a central executive council, which would focus all the experience gained in different quarters by the co-ordinated societies-experience, that is, in the choice of pieces, length of programmes, means of advertisement, and many other details essential to the successful working of such a scheme. As we have already hinted, the greatest judgment and discrimination is needed in drawing up a programme for a Popular Concert; and the most successful educators of the public taste have been those who, while resolute in excluding anything bad or vulgar in tendency, have been ready to recognise the claims of everything first rate dans son genre, irrespective of what that genre may be. There is a distinct danger lest those who set before themselves the laudable end of elevating the popular taste in music should lose sight of the fact that people like to be amused, and that in music, as in other spheres, it is perfectly possible to awaken laughter by legitimate means. Serious themselves they judge others from the automorphic standpoint, a common source of error; and, while lamenting the popularity of comic songs, hardly recognise the fact that there can be such a thing as a song which is at

do not abound, but if we cross the water we find scores of really witty verses linked to airs that are at any rate tuneful and unobjectionable, such as Lover's. Without sharing the exaggerated views, prevalent in some quarters, as to the value of Irish music, we unhesitatingly yield to Ireland the palm in this department. Harmless and agreeable comedy can be found nearer home too, in instance of which we have only to point to the success which attends Mr. Gatty's excellent nonsense, alike in the East and West End, when sung by the author; for it is, perhaps, as hard to sing a comic song well as it is to write it. Needless to say, we are not arguing for programmes mainly composed of comic songs, but merely protesting against their absolute exclusion. A little comedy in music will go a long way, but in this connection we hold it to be most valuable, and, speaking for ourselves, we would always prefer to hear a comic song rather than a mawkish modern ballad-a species of composition which it is well nigh impossible to exclude from any programme. On this head we may be permitted to say a few words on Music Halls and the secret of their success, although they do not come directly within the scope of this article, the supporters of the leading Music Halls being drawn from the well-to-do, or comparatively well-to-do, classes. At the same time, the influence they exert upon society and current literature is very considerable; their connection with the stage is closer than it ever has been, and their choicest morceaux—volitant per ora virûm, aye, and of women too of all grades. our opinion, consists in the fact that by a noisy vivacity, which counterfeits humour, and by a thinlyveiled suggestiveness, which does duty for wit, their performers contrive to amuse their audience to the accompaniment of airs of such straightforward simplicity as admits of their being speedily whistled, sung, and piano-organised into the four corners of the kingdom. Whatever we may think of the Music Halls, the promoters of People's Concerts may learn two lessons from them without harbouring the slightest intention of competing with them upon their own ground. The first is not to discard that which amuses; and the second, which is also to be learned from the street organ, is the value of repetition. The vilest trash becomes "popular" from iteration, and the greatest masterpieces have won their way to acceptance and fame only after repeated hearings. A friend, who spends a great deal of his leisure time at the Inventions Exhibition - his visits having already amounted to upwards of sixty-assures us that there is no piece in the répertoire of the Grenadier Guards' band more popular or more frequently repeated than the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and that he has observed a steady growth in the heartiness of its reception, which may be not unjustifiably ascribed to the familiarity which here breeds not contempt but admiration. At the same time, we confess that we do not share the extravagant notions of some artistic enthusiasts, as to the refining influences exerted by music, and particularly Wagner's music, on intelligences cultivated or uncultivated. We have stated elsewhere that we can quite believe the performance of such a piece as the "Tannhäuser" Overture by a firstrate orchestra might have an electrifying effect upon a purely popular audience. But what electrifies does not ex ipso facto elevate, refine, and purify the intelligence of the hearer. On the contrary, educated auditors often complain that the music in question has an upsetting and feverish effect upon them. By all means let the East Ender have a chance of hearing Wagner, but do not expect, as some enthusiasts seem to do, that his music will at once work miracles, and supply them with a soul-satisfying religion. There is a once humorous and not vulgar. It is true that they very interesting and beautiful theory in connection with the doctrine of evolution, known as the recapitulation theory, which seeks to establish that the physical changes which the individual undergoes in his passage from embryo to adult are a recapitulation of the structural changes through which the race has passed. This theory is capable of extension to other spheres, and may be applied to the development of the artistic intelligence. Our advanced civilisation produces the lowest types of physical and mental development alongside of the highest, and what is good or suited for the one is not by any means good or suitable for the other. There is an absolute good and a relative good, and what is good for one man is not good for another - nay, is often absolutely poison. The organ-grinder, who makes many of us groan and gnash our teeth, is hailed with enthusiasm by the unregenerate housemaid, and to abolish him would, we fear, be to tamper seriously with the liberty of the subject. A plébiscite on the question would probably show a majority of votes in his favour. have endeavoured to show by the foregoing remarks that in dealing with uncultivated intelligences it is unadvisable to present them with a fare they cannot digest. Rather should we endeavour to temper the severity of their diet with wholesome comedy, where it is possible, and lively dance-music which does not degenerate into mere jingle. It is difficult to exaggerate the value to suffering humanity, in a serious age, of exhilarating airs like "The Blue Danube," the perennial freshness of which is the truest test of its merit. We confess that we do not believe in a musical millennium. There will always be a large section who will prefer melody to harmony, and their claims must be treated with consideration, not to say indulgence, by those who undertake their education. At the same time, we believe that such indulgence is compatible with an adherence to none but the best writers in the various walks of composition. The taste of a popular audience is often far better than we are inclined to credit it with, and it was only the other day that an instance came to our ears of this fact. A lady amateur, nothing doubting, offered as her contribution to the programme of a People's Concert a song of her own composition, and was actually hissed for her pains. This was a rude but a salutary lesson, proving that what is tolerated or even admired in the drawing-room, will not always be acceptable to an audience untrammelled by the dictates of well-bred hypocrisy. A further reason against adopting too uncompromising and rigorous an attitude in the selection of music to be performed at People's Concerts, is to be found in the fact that a certain proportion of the auditors are not in the enjoyment of that physical well-being which is requisite to enable any intellectual or emotional stimulus to have its due effect upon them. Handicapped in the struggle for existence by the law of heredity, stunted morally and physically by their surroundings, the masses need to have the material conditions of their lives improved before they can assimilate artistic teaching in more than homeopathic doses. A few years ago we heard one of our most famous preachers proclaim much the same doctrine with regard to religion: that the higher life was impossible until the material needs were satisfied, that cleanliness in fact must precede godliness, and a modicum of physical comfort the awakening of religious aspirations. It is a notorious fact that even an attack of dyspensia in a well-nourished organisation will rob the landscape of its brightness, and render us inaccessible to the beauties of nature or the charms of society. In like manner, those who have always lived in morbid social and physical conditions are not fit subjects for the more complex manifestations of art. It is not the average person but the enthusiast who can dispense häuser" Overture. Great as are the opportunities with his dinner to hear a Richter Concert; in the former, the omission would probably entirely destroy his powers of appreciation, and even the latter can hardly remain oblivious throughout of the sacrifice he has made. We have employed this homely illustration to emphasise our opinion that no undue tax should be put upon the intellect of those who are habitually underfed. The recent discussion about over-pressure in our elementary schools elicited the fact that children in the Board Schools were, in many cases, minus their breakfasts on their arrival in the morning, and, therefore, unfit to bear the amount of brain work which might fairly be expected of properly fed pupils. Now we do not hold that the proper way of appealing to the heart or intellect is through the stomach-which seems to be the principle on which many entertainments for the benefit of the well-to-do classes are organised, and to the carrying out of which their success is so largely attributable - but we merely wish to point out that the material conditions of the auditor cannot be overlooked. A special feature—malicious persons would say the special feature -of the Philharmonic Concerts at Liverpool is the long interval, during which the well-dressed stall or box holders promenade and partake of light refreshment in the foyer. Nay, in musical Manchester itself, the popularity of the afternoon recitals in the Concert Hall was notably enhanced by the institution of afternoon tea, served during the interval. We speak feelingly on the subject, for we have ourselves witnessed in former years the struggles which took place among competing candidates for refreshment, and have striven, not always successfully, to satisfy the needs of the thirsty matron and her expectant daughters. Music may soothe pain in some natures, and has been known to calm mental excitement in others, from the days of Saul down to the present; but if it cannot appease the appetite or satisfy the thirsty souls of the sleek and prosperous, we must be prepared to encounter similar earthly impulses amongst their needier fellows. We are very far from wishing to see music made an excuse for eating and drinking; but if we may be allowed, for the moment, to enter the region of suggestion, we venture to express our opinion that at musical entertainments organised for the benefit of the very poor it might not be a bad plan, where the funds of the society admitted it, to try the experiment of prefacing the Concert by dispensing light refreshments. We know this will be denounced by many as a system of bribery, and yet we believe it to be worth a trial; for it would only be extending to those who cannot afford to pay for it what has long proved on the Continent, and lately in England, a most acceptable form of recreation and musical education. A very large proportion of those millions who have visited the Exhibitions at South Kensington have done so because of the joint attractions offered by music, illuminations, and refreshment in the open air. The layman is bewildered by machinery, and after a dozen visits may carry very little away with him of the nature of the exhibits. But he has heard and seen the redoubtable Herr Strauss, and in blissful ignorance of the strictures passed upon him for his renderings of Wagner and the classical masters, and on his band for their shortcomings, has been diverted and exhilarated by the spirit and charm of the Viennese waltz, and, unconsciously, has had his notions of rhythm expanded. Or may be, with pardonable patriotism, he has preferred the performance of the Grenadier Guards' band, and has been initiated into the beauties of Gounod's "Faust," and discovered, on a sixth hearing, that his favourite piece is the "Tannfor enjoyment afforded by these Exhibitions, opportunities which are fortunately within the reach of many of the working-classes, we are still behind our neighbours on the Continent in the facilities which are offered to the public for the hearing of good music. As we write these words we have before us the programme of a Concert given in the Café Belvedere, on the Brühl'sche Terrasse, at Dresden, just ten years ago (September 22, 1875), where the excellent band of the Royal Saxon Pioneers discoursed good music of all sorts, ranging from Strauss to Wagner and Meyerbeer, from 6 to 10 p.m. The admission fee, including programmes, amounted to ninepence, and the audience, which was uniformly attentive, comprised gentlemen and ladies-the latter generally with their knitting or other work-who had come to dine, as well as persons in humbler stations of life who sipped their beer while they listened to the music. Altogether, it was a very pleasant spectacle, reflecting the domestic aspect of German life in agreeable fashion, as well as the catholic taste for music, which breaks down social barriers, and we have often wondered and regretted why such gatherings should be impossible amongst us, thanks to our "endless class distincas well as to the fact that it would be exceedingly difficult to keep such an establishment free from disreputable visitors in London. Such an institution seemed to us to answer very satisfactorily the needs of a "Music Hall," and we shall gladly hail the day when that term is synonymous for a form of entertainment neither common nor unclean. There is this to be said, however, with regard even to the frequenters of Music Halls, that once they begin to exhibit a dissatisfaction with those who cater for them, they are amenable to higher and healthier influences, so that all efforts to wean them from what is unworthy are deserving of encouragement. On this head, the following anecdote, for the absolute truth of which we are prepared to vouch, is not without its significance. An acquaintance of the writer's, who, as a young man, was resident in London, had the entrée of the chief Music Halls by reason of his relationship with a leading brewer. Accordingly, for many months, so he assured us, he hardly ever missed a night at these places of entertainment, until quite suddenly a great loathing for their performances seized hold of him, and he never set foot inside one of them again. This episode is all the more interesting when we add that his love for good music, and especially that of Beethoven, now amounts to a positive veneration. Wherefore, then, as Ireland has been defined as a grand country to live out of, so the Music Hall may command our regard as a grand place to leave off going to. Let us, then, endeavour to love our enemy, the piano-organ man, like Mr. Haweis, not because he is good in himself, but relatively good, and may serve as a stepping stone to better things for our less fortunate brothers and sisters. We have already spoken of the great influence wielded by the Music Halls, and we may add that the theatre orchestras, bad as they are, exert considerable powers in the popularising and diffusion of music, generally of a trashy order. It is indeed a of music, generally of a trashy order. source of surprise and regret that at playhouses, where no expense is spared in mounting pieces, the musical accessories, often of considerable importance, are so grossly neglected or inadequately attended to. The performances at the Court Theatre afford an agreeable exception to a rule which is one of the many instances of that lack of the sense of proportion, which marks so many dramatic and musical enterprises in this country.

As a postscript to these scattered remarks, we which prevails at Southsea, and certainly did prevail at Southport, of having a public performance of sacred music by a military band on Sundays, on the pier or parade. Such gratuitous performances deserve all encouragement, and are worthy of widespread imitation.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XVII .- SEBASTIAN BACH (continued from page 522).

Bach's attempt to obtain a position in Dantzig through the good offices of his friend Erdmann having failed, there was no other course before the master than to remain in Leipzig and continue to face, as best he could, the worries of a difficult post.
Providence, thus ruling, was really kind, if Bach could only have known it. He was a short-sighted mortal, like the rest of us, and could not possibly have foreseen that the coming of a new Rector, Johann Matthias Gesner, to the Thomas School, meant for him the advent of a season of peace—the happiest time he was destined to spend in the Saxon city. Gesner, like our own Arnold, seems to have been a born schoolmaster. Spitta says of him: "Together with a vast store of practical learning, he possessed in an eminent degree the power of governing; resolute firmness was combined in his character with humanity and gentleness: in his conduct to the Council he was uniformly polite, but decided." Further evidence as to the character of this remarkable man appears in a work written by one of his own pupils, and published at Leipzig in 1733: "In discipline he guided himself very precisely by the laws of the School, at that time just revised. He was cautious in punishing, and in order to avoid undue severity would let a few days pass after the delin-quency was committed. Then in the evening, after prayers, and when the motett was sung, he would come among the scholars, call up the criminal, point out with impressive gravity the impropriety and sinfulness of his fault, and then pronounce his verdict as to the punishment. This way of delivering judgment had a wonderful effect, all the more because he was universally respected. . . . Gesner was, in other respects, very affable and affectionate in his intercourse with the boys, and would look in upon them even during the singing lessons, with which the Rectors did not usually trouble themselves, and would listen with pleasure to the practising of a piece of church music. If he found any boy at work in his room at anything which, though not part of his school task, was useful in itself, he did not fall upon him with a storm of indignation, but would recommend him to further study and practice, because, said he, the State had need of every variety of talent and skill. And to all he would preach, when opportunity offered, 'Always do something that is of some definite use, and which you can turn to account in your calling in life." It is not surprising that the Leipzig Council, having obtained so valuable a servant, set great store by him. They deferred to his opinion at all times on matters connected with his duties, and even took care of his person to the extent of transporting him from his house to the School and back again in a chair specially provided at the public

It may be asked how all this affected Bach. The answer is, in the first place, that Gesner's authority. guided by his amiability and tact, restored peace to the School; and, next, that the new Rector, having formed a strong attachment to the Cantor, whom he had before met at Weimar, used his great influence to make things comfortable for him. Particularly, should like to call attention to the excellent practice he furthered Bach's musical projects, and did much to abate what the master conceived to be grievances. In this last respect, he persuaded the Council to relieve Bach from general teaching, and make him supervisor of the School—an easy post with little more than nominal duties. Moreover, he was able to put the Cantor's pecuniary relations with his superiors on a satisfactory footing, and thus crown the edifice of reconciliation and content. Gesner's estimate of Bach as a musician appears in a quaint passage written as a note to his edition of the Institutiones Oratoriæ of Marcus Fabius Ouinctilianus. Quinctilian, referring to the capacity of doing several things at once, instances a performer who could sing, play on the lyre, and mark time with his foot simultaneously. Gesner's comment runs as follows:-

"All these, my Fabius, you would deem very trivial could you but rise from the dead and see Bach (whom I mention because not long ago he was my colleague in the Thomas School at Leipzig); how he with both hands, and using all his fingers, plays on a keyboard which seems to consist of many lyres in one, and may be called the instrument of instruments, of which the innumerable pipes are made to sound by means of bellows; and how he, going one way with his hands, and another way with the utmost celerity with his feet, elicits by his unaided skill many of the most various passages, which, however, uniting produce as it were hosts of harmonious sounds; I say could you only see him, how he achieves what a number of your lyre-players and six hundred fluteplayers could never achieve, not as one who may sing to the lyre, and so perform his part, but by presiding over thirty or forty performers all at once, re-calling this one by a nod, another by a stamp of the foot, another with a warning finger, keeping time and tune; and while high tones are given out by some, deep tones by others, and notes between them by others, this one man, standing alone in the midst of the loud sounds, having the hardest task of all, can discern at every moment if any one goes astray, and can keep all the musicians in order, restore any waverer to certainty, and prevent him from going wrong; rhythm is in his every limb, he takes in all the harmonies by his subtle ear, as it were uttering all the different parts by the medium of his own mouth. Great admirer as I am of antiquity in other respects, I yet deem this Bach of mine, and whosoever there may chance to be that resembles him, to comprise in himself many Orpheuses and twenty Arions.

The tone of almost childish wonder in this panegyric shows us that Gesner was no musician, but he was Rector of the School, and to have in him such an admirer meant more for Bach than we can now conceive. Indeed, the Cantor stood, during Gesner's reign, at the height of good fortune. He was master in his own domain; he conducted the leading musical society of the town, his pupils were organists at the principal churches, and the public, though but dimly perceptive of his greatness, saw enough to inspire them with respect and pride. This state of things was decidedly too good to last long, and accordingly a change came after a little while; Gesner resigning his position and being succeeded by the co-Rector, Johann August Ernesti. The end of the gracious Gesner period—which began in June, 1730—seems to have occurred about four years later.

Bach was, for some time, on good terms with Ernesti, and on two occasions requested him to act as godfather to a newly arrived member of his everincreasing family. Their relations continued amicable till 1736, and then suddenly became hostile; Bach declaring war on the old ground of infringed rights and amusing that we shall tell it at length.

It will be in recollection that Bach had four choirs under him, each of these having a prefect chosen from among the pupils to act as the Cantor's deputy. The prefect of the first choir-naturally an important official in his way-was one Gottfried Theodor Krause, a capable musician, but, as it would seem, an indifferent disciplinarian. Do what he would, Gottfried failed to exercise control over his boys, and, on the occasion of a certain wedding, became exasperated to the point of inflicting corporal punishment. The young ne'er-do-weels of the choir resisted this assumption of penal authority, whereupon Gottfried laid about him with his cane in a promiscuous manner, inflicting considerable damage. The boys complained to the Rector, who also straightway lost his temper, and sentenced the prefect to an ignominious flogging in presence of the whole school. This brought Bach into the field. He could not sit still and see his deputy suffer for merely keeping order with excess of zeal. Twice the Cantor appealed to the Rector on Gottfried's behalf, and twice was as good as told to mind his own business. Nevertheless, the punishment failed to reach the culprit, who incontinently ran away. To be revenged, Ernesti confiscated the lad's singing money, and was defeated on that point also; the Council, on petition from Krause, ordering that it be paid over tohim forthwith. So the incident closed, but it left the relations between Bach and Ernesti in a very delicate state, presently to be followed by open rupture. No sooner had Gottfried Krause vacated the post of first prefect, than Ernesti, disregarding the rights of the Cantor, took upon himself to appoint a successor, pro tem., in the person of the second prefect, another Krause christened Johann Gottlob. Bach acquiesced in the step, though annoyed at the Rector's usurpation, and, despite his opinion, stated to Ernesti himself that Gottlob was an incapable person and a "disreputable dog" to boot. But the master's equanimity gave way after a few of the new prefect's failures. He had not made Gottlob, but he would unmake him, and did so, appointing Samuel Küttler in his place. Away went Gottlob to the Rector for redress, and was sent back to the Cantor. Then did Bach's wrath work mightily. He exclaimed to poor incompetent Gottlob: "The Rector shoved you into the place of first prefect, and on his own authority; and I have turned you out again to show him who is master here." These words the angry musician repeated even to Ernesti, whereupon war began in good earnest. The Rector made the first move, sending to Bach a written demand for Gottlob's re-installation, to which the Cantor, alarmed lest he had gone too far, promised obedience, but not instant obedience. Day after day passed with nothing done, and finally the Rector's patience gave out. On a Saturday he notified Bach that unless he re-instated Gottlob at once, that function would be discharged on the following morning by the Rector himself. Our master, nursing his anger, made no reply, and Ernesti kept his word by replacing the "disreputable dog" again at the head of the choir. Now came an explosion. On arriving at the church for matins, and hearing of what had been done, Bach appealed to the Superintendent, Deyling, and, getting only a promise of future satisfaction, took the law into his own hands. While yet the service went on, he sent round to St. Thomas's Church for his own nominee, Küttler, marched him into St. Nicholas's, and, as a hymn was being sung, put him in the prefect's place, out of which he had previously turned Gottlob. Then, swelling with a mighty indignation, he went home and and privileges. The story of this rupture is so edifying indited a complaint to the Town Council. Here it is :-

"Magnifici, most Noble, Illustrious, Learned, and Worshipful Gentlemen and Patrons.

"May it please your Worships graciously to allow me to represent to you that whereas, according to your Worships' ordering of the School of St. Thomas, it pertains to the Cantor to choose from among the scholars those whom he considers fit and able to be Prefects, and in electing them to have regard not only to the voice that it be good and clear, but also to see that the Prefects, and especially the one who leads the first Choir, shall be able to undertake the direction of the Musical Choir in the absence of the Cantor; and whereas this rule has been hitherto observed by the Cantors without the concurrence of the Rectors; yet and notwithstanding, the present Rector, M. Johann Aug. Ernesti, has lately endeavoured, without my knowledge and approval, to assume the appointment of the Prefect in the first Choir, so that he recently appointed Krause, the Prefect of the second Choir, to be Prefect of the first Choir, and refuses to withdraw, in spite of all my civil remonstrances. Since I cannot suffer this to pass, being against the aforesaid order and traditional usage of the School, and to the prejudice of my successors, and to the injury of the Musical Choir, I now present to your Worships my most dutiful petition, graciously to decide this difference between the Rector and myself in my office; and because this presumption on the part of the Rector to the appointment of the Prefects might lead to strife and to the prejudice of the scholars, I pray that in your great benevolence and care for the School of St. Thomas you will direct the Rector, M. Ernesti, to leave for the future, as hitherto, and according to the order and usage of the School, the appointment of Prefects to myself alone, and thus graciously protect me in my office.

"Trusting to your Worships' most gracious indul-gence, and abiding in the most dutiful respect, I am, yours most obediently,-J. S. BACH."

While our master penned this letter, Ernesti did not let the grass grow under his feet. No sooner was morning service over than he betook himself to the Superintendent, and so represented matters as to secure his support. An intimation of this important fact was immediately made to Bach without awing him in the least. He had appealed to the highest authority, and sent angry word that, be the cost what it may, he would not budge an inch from the stand he had made upon his rights. Hearing this, the Rector went a step further. The choir having assembled for evening service, Ernesti appeared and forbad the boys to yield any obedience to Bach in the matter of the prefects. He at the same time renewed the game of battledore and shuttlecock by re-instating Krause. Presently in came the Cantor, to find his authority more openly defied than ever. Again anger overcame him. We are told that he ejected Krause "with much vehemence," which may mean that he kicked him out. But he could not get rid of all his difficulties in the same manner. Küttler appears to have absented himself, and not one of the other lads, who, like him, had the fear of the Rector before their eyes, would undertake to lead the Motett. Here was a position for a self-respecting Cantor! Happily the master's old pupil, Krebs, was in the church, and came forward to take the vacant post. Bach nursed his indignation all that evening, for when, at supper time, Küttler came to table, the Cantor descended upon him like a thunderbolt: "Go away, sir; you have obeyed the Rector rather than So, in clouds and storm, ended a memorable Leipzig Sunday.

Next morning Bach went to his desk and wrote another letter to the Town Council:-

"Though only yesterday I, in a most respectful memorial, troubled your Worships because of the great indignity done to me by Herr Rector Ernesti, through his attempted encroachment on the function hitherto assigned to myself, of Cantor and of Director of the Musical Choir in connection with the Thomas School here, by his interference in the appointment of the Prefect, and prayed for your Worships' gracious protection; yet I find myself under the necessity of again most humbly bringing to your Worships' notice that, although I had already informed the said Herr Rector Ernesti that I had complained to your Worships, and that I expected your decided judgment on the matter, he, nevertheless, regardless of the respect due to your Honourable Council, again presumed to let all the scholars know that none should, under pain of relegation and castigation, dare to sing or conduct the usual Motett in place of Krause, who is, as I stated in my most dutiful memorial of yesterday, unfit for the direction of a Musical Choir, and whom he wishes to force upon me as Prefect of the first Choir. Hence it came then, that in the Nicolai Church, at the afternoon service yesterday, to my great humiliation and dejection, not a single scholar would undertake to lead the singing, much less to conduct the Motett for fear of being punished. Indeed, the service would thereby have been interrupted had not, most fortunately, these duties been undertaken by an old scholar of St. Thomas's, of the name of Krebs, at my request. I repersented, in my late most humble memorial, that the appointment of the Prefect does not, according to the rules and usages of the School, pertain to the Rector; he has, moreover, by his mode of action, greatly vexed and offended against me in my official position, and thus weakened and indeed, tried to deprive me of the full authority over the scholars in all matters of Church and other music which I ought to have, and which authority was also conferred upon me by your most Honourable Council on my accession to office. It is hence to be feared that, were such high-handed proceedings to continue, the services would be interfered with, and the music of the Church greatly deteriorate, while the School itself would in a short time be so injured that it would take many years to restore it to the same degree of efficiency in which it has hitherto been. Therefore I once more submit to your Worships my most dutiful and earnest supplication, since officially I cannot pass the matter over, that you will stringently admonish the Rector, since discipline is endangered, that he will hereafter not molest me in my office, nor hinder the scholars in their obedience to me by his unjust warnings, and by threats of severe punishment, but rather that he will see to it, as is his duty, that the School and Musical Choir shall be improved rather than deteriorated. I hope for your gracious indulgence and protection in my office, and abiding in the most profound respect, I am, &c .- J. S. BACH.'

Bach's bold and audacious epistle was followed, on Wednesday, by a communication dealing exclusively with the character and musical disabilities of the Rector's protégé, Gottlob. This was by no means the main question, but Bach desired to damage the Rector by showing up the "disreputable dog" he favoured. Here follows the paper, written throughout in the master's own hand:

"The full and true history of the matter regarding the scholar Krause, whom the Rector wishes to force upon me as first Prefect, is as follows: Said Krause had, so long as a year ago, so bad a reputation on account of his disorderly life and consequent debts, that a Council Meeting was held, which emphatically intimated to him that although he had, on account of his dissolute life, well deserved to be forthwith expelled from the School, yet, in consideration of his needy circumstances (for he had himself owned to having contracted debts to the amount of twenty thalers). and on his promising amendment, they were willing to try him for another quarter, when, according as his behaviour was improved or not, he would be informed whether he was to be retained or removed. Now, the Rector has always shown a special predilection for him, Krause, and verbally begged me to make him a Prefect. But I remonstrated that he was not fitted for it; whereupon the Rector replied that I might nevertheless do so, since it might enable Krause to free himself of his debts, and so the School be spared a constantly increasing scandal, especially as his time would so soon be up, and he would thus be got rid of with a good grace. I, therefore, willing to do the Rector a pleasure, made Krause a Prefect in the New Church, where the scholars have nothing else to sing but Chorals and Motetts, and have nothing to do with other concerted music, which is managed by the organist himself, for I considered that his school years had expired all but one, and it was not to be expected that he would come to conduct either the first or second Choir. Subsequently, however, the Prefect of the first Choir, by name Nagel, from Nürnberg, complained, at the singing of the last New Year, that, owing to weakness of constitution, he should not be able to continue with it; it therefore became necessary to make a change out of the usual course of time in the arrangement of the Prefects, and to shift the second Prefect into the first Choir, and, of necessity, to receive the oft-named Krause into the second Choir. He, however, made various mistakes in beating the time, as I have been told by the Herr Con-Rector, who undertook the inspection of the second Choir, and upon enquiry concerning these mistakes all the scholars laid the blame wholly and solely upon the Prefect, on account of his faulty beating of the time. Moreover, I myself, at a recent singing lessson, took occasion to test his conducting of the time, when he acquitted himself so badly that he could not even give the accurate beat in the two chief modes of time—namely, the equal or common time, and the unequal or triple time-but made triple into common time, and vice versa, as all the scholars will readily affirm. Being, therefore, fully convinced of his incapacity, I could not possibly trust him as Prefect of the first Choir, particularly as the sacred music which is performed by the first Choir, and which is mostly of my own composition, is incomparably more difficult and intricate than that which is done by the second Choir. These sing only on Festivals, and in choosing their music I am mainly guided by the ability of those who are to render it. And although further circumstances might be mentioned which would still more prove the incapacity of Krause, yet I think the grounds already adduced sufficiently show my complaints to your Honourable Council to be justified, and to call for a remedy without delay.—Joh. Seb. Bach."

There is reason to believe that the Town Council lost no time in communicating with Ernesti on the question at issue. At any rate, the Rector proceeded, on Friday, to lay his case before their Worships. He began by traversing Bach's assertion of right to the appointment of Prefects, the Cantor's privilege being to select such scholars as he deemed fit, the Rector making an appointment from these.

After declaring that Bach had dismissed Krause simply out of spite to himself, he gave a fair statement of the course of events on the previous Sunday, throwing some light on the Cantor's manner by stating that he drove poor Gottlob away "with much I. In an shouting and noise." But the sting of this document one part—lay in its tail, the Rector, by way of peroration, entreating the Council to make Bach "attend to his duties with greater diligence"; and alleging that the whole difficulty with Krause arose out of the Cantor's "neglect in not undertaking the direction of certain musical performances himself." As to this point, the balance of evidence is clearly on Ernesti's side. Bach's school duties were not discharged with the fidelity of a scrupulously faithful servant. We can easily understand why. If a Toledo blade could reason and feel it would, as a matter of course, resent being used to cut cabbages instead of cleaving men's heads, and a great musical genius like Bach was assuredly under strong inducements to employ his time to better purpose than in doing work for which no genius was required. At the same time, a man who sternly exacts his full rights must expect to be called upon for the discharge of his complete obligations. In that he fell short of the one while asserting the other with persistence, not to say presumption, the illustrious master was decidedly in the wrong.

With the next Sunday came a repetition of the unseemly proceedings already described. Ernesti re-instated Gottlob as prefect; Bach deposed him; no scholar would lead the Motett, and so on. The same day, Bach addressed a third appeal to the Town Council, couched in terms as follows:-

"Your Worships will call to your gracious remembrance that I was under the necessity of bringing to your notice the disorders which occurred this day week in the performance of public service in consequence of the arrangements made by the Rector of the Thomas School here, M. Ernesti. To-day, both forenoon and afternoon, the same things occurred again, and I was obliged, in order to avoid a great commotion in the Church and disturbance of the service, to direct the Motett myself, and to get a student to lead the singing. And as matters are likely to become worse in the course of time, and I shall scarcely be able to maintain my authority in future with the scholars placed under me without the effectual interference of your Worships, my noble Patrons, and should, therefore, not be responsible were further and perhaps irreparable disorders to arise, I cannot avoid respectfully representing this to your Worships with the most dutiful prayer that your Worships will be pleased to restrain the Rector without delay, and that you will, by accelerating the final resolution, for which I have prayed, and, according to your zeal for the common weal, prevent, as is to be apprehended, public offences in the Church, disorders in the School, diminution of my authority with the scholars requisite in my office, and other serious consequences.—J. S. BACH."

How this contest went on, how it ended, and what came of it, must be told in another chapter.

By Joseph Goddard.

Another highly marked feature of musical development at this period is a massive accentuation. Handel is the great exponent of this kind of effect. The following are some of the general forms in which he

1. In antiphonal effects between the full chorus and

2. In antiphonal effects involved between the divisions of a double chorus, and also one division and the full double chorus; a fine example of the latter effect terminates the Chorus "He spake the word, in "Israel in Egypt."

3. In what we may term organic rhetorical design, grand illustration of which occurs in the Chorus

"For unto us a son is given "-

In the two former cases contrast is obtained through difference in the volume of the relative effects; but in the latter case the contrast is organic, and quite apart from any effect that might have been produced by differences of material volume. So independent is Handel in this case of the latter kind of aid, that he sets the phrase leading immediately to the fortissimo, for full chorus. It is to be observed, speaking of the voice-part alone, that in this portion of the chorus in question, both melodic outline and harmonic effect are reduced to zero-there being no melody, whilst harmony only serves to give volume to the effect of emphasis. But taking in the figure or melody of the accompaniment-peculiar power of special expression, the whole pas- it arrives at the chord of the diminished seventh, sage may be regarded as coming under the head of speaks of dubiety and profound mistrust-counter-melodic effect, with accent superadded as leading feature.

4. This leads us to another step attained by the art of this period. This step consists of a power of special expression—that is to say, the suggestion by instrumental means, or by a chorus employed impersonally, of the sentiments pervading certain occasions. The accompaniment, for instance, of which a portion has just been cited, expresses a mingled emotion of wonder and homage. Again, the accompaniment in the following passage from the "Hallelujah Chorus" suggests majestic-far-reachingcontrolwhilst that of the following passage expresses

The accompaniment again to the recitative "All they that see him "- expresses mockery-the holding up to scorn, and, at the same time, is characteristic and original, from a purely musical point of view; whilst the subsequent which, though simple in form, evinces Handel's passage to the words "And shake their heads," as

This power of special expression is also shown in the suggestion of purely objective effects. Examples abound in "Israel in Egypt." In one place the chorus is in "Darkness," from the depths of which the voices are heard as they separate, and, as it were, lose themselves. In another it is the sea, "over-whelming," "standing upright as a heap"; or the silent, massive, underdepth through which the descending bass passage suggests the falling "to the bottom as a stone." A volume could be filled with examples of Handel's unique power of suggestionexamples always as unlaboured as they are exact in the accomplishment of their aim. Every objective effect, as well as subjective state, seems caught with simple fidelity, and wrought into music of sublime impressiveness. Even the curling incense "From the censer," is lightly, yet surely, drawn; whilst supreme majesty and state are suggested with a dignity befitting even the subject of the text, in the following simple melodic lineament-

The reflection here arises that notwithstanding the increased resources for expression which the modern development of music has brought with it, such clear suggesting amid inherent effect, as exists in the foregoing and other examples of the Handelian period, still remains unsurpassed.

Such then are the fundamental steps achieved at this period; we may here briefly recapitulate them. They are:-

- 1. Dramatic expression in melody.
- 2. The development of the choral.
- 3. Clear counter-melodic effect.
 4. The application of definite harmonic progression to the fugal form.
 - 5. Ornate harmonic construction.
 - 6. Massive rhetorical design.
- . Special expression, that is to say, the suggestion of the feeling associated with particular occasions, also the suggestion of objective effects, by instrumentation, or by the chorus acting impersonally.
 - 8. Expression by pure harmonic effect.

Of these various sides of musical development, "dramatic expression in melody" and "the choral" form portions of the vital activity of modern music. The same may be said of "massive rhetorical design," with the qualification that past examples of this effect remain the highest attained. Of "special expression," "expression by pure harmonic effect," and "clear counter-melodic effect," we may say that, though exemplified in the past by inordinate genius, they constitute the principal portion of the vital activity of the present period-they belong to the present.

Fugal effect, involving clear harmonic progression, is the great landmark of the Handelian period. This effect, in combination with "massive rhetorical design," with the "choral," and with "dramatic power in theme," involved a ripeness of conditionsa force of circumstances—which permitted the genius of the time to produce works which probably exhibit musical art at its highest power.

THE GREAT CHORAL WORKS OF THE MODERN PERIOD.

In the choral expressions of the modern period we find strong traces of the fugal impulse; but we also find in many examples of the fugal writing of this period a tendency to diffuseness. The fugal choral writing of Haydn and Mendelssohn, though connected with new and fine effects of both melody and harmony, tends to revert to that visible complexity which in art is the grave of expression, and from which the genius of Handel raised the fugal style. But this new complexity, like the old, is the pregnant chaos of new effects—the fruitful strife of progress. It is connected with that onward leap in harmony and melody exemplified so strikingly by Haydn. Fugal effect of a particular period involves generally the harmonic and melodic development of that period. In the Handelian period the harmonic combinations and progressions were well within the range of vocal resources. The modulations were not rapid, nor did they follow one another very closely: there was a deliberate character about every harmonic progression; and if the parts were elaborately arranged, the effect was free from other elements of complexity.

But new elements of complexity began to attend fugal writing at the epoch of Haydn. At this period appeared richer harmonies—harmonies often involving chromatic departures without modulationwhilst modulation became bolder and more frequent. The feature, too, of an independent accompaniment, used sparingly but always effectively by Handel, becomes more developed and more frequent. changes were attended by a change in melody itself, which, whilst becoming to a great extent dependent upon the new harmonic progressions, unfolded new expression. Whereas the subjects of Handel have a certain homophonal spirit-are almost independent of harmonisation, and demand at most only the simplest harmony-those of Haydn and his successors belong to a melodic impulse, into which the feeling for special harmonic effect largely enters.*

* From the discovery of clearly defined chords, melody has depended for new scope and effect upon harmony. Between melody and harmony a connection exists somewhat similar to that between form and colour. There is more than a likeness between the control of the

It is not that the more modern composers always attempt fugues with subjects unfitted for fugal treatment, but that the strength of their genius exhibits itself in melody depending upon special harmonic treatment. For instance, the strength of Haydn's genius is not shown in the following subject, which, harmony may increase considerably the force of melody within a certain melodic space. These relations of harmony and melody are exemplified in the progress of music from the period of Palestrina to the present time.

We have observed, concerning the first application of chords to Lutheran chants, that whilst these chords imparted depth to each pote of the melody, they did not always strengthen the coherence of these notes. Here harmony, whilst it may be said to have given a new sensation to the influence of melody, sometimes weakened the consciousness of the melodic design. When, however, the chord of consciousness of the melodic design. When, however, the chord of the dominant seventh became employed in harmonisation, this consciousness was strengthened. The central sound of the melodic design being always clearly suggested whenever this chord is heard, the relations of all other portions of that design are also clearly realised. We have observed further that, by the employment of this chord in harmonisation, melody could cover more than one key without loss of clearness. Subsequently, the melody could cover more than one key without loss of clearness. Subsequently, the control of the complete of the melody covering a quasifollowing extract exemplifies the melody covering a quasi-

The following extract exemplifies the melody passing to a somewhat removed key, by a new treatment of the dominant seventh, by its changing to a chord of the ninth on the same root, or passing to a chord of the diminished seventh, a third higher, whichever way the progression—which serves to introduce the G flat of the new key—

Thus we see that in the progress of harmonic development, the melodic impulse finds new outlets. Melody becomes more and more dependent upon harmony whilst undergoing itself modification of form. Through the instrumentality of harmony the salient points of melodic effect follow one another more closely; melodic effect acquires more force in proportion to its length. The following extracts from M. Gounod exemplify the force and vividness of expression which short and simple melodic lineaments may acquire by subtle harmonic as he exemplifies, is at the same time not altogether unfitted for fugal treatment-but this strength betrays itself more conspicuously as the subject becomes developed into melody requiring special harmony-

The fugal writing in Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" embraces instructive examples of the general complexity which in some cases resulted from pursuing this style amid the forces unfolded by the new developments in harmony and melody which were ushered in by Haydn. If we examine the fugal portion of the first chorus, commencing with the subject-we find, in the first place, a subject demanding for adequate definition a strong and searching harmony, one result of which circumstance is to render this subject wherever it occurs, not merely prominent, but the only thematic feature having independent character, the counter-themes being little more than accessory parts of the harmony. We find, in the second place, frequent and rapid modulation; in the third place, an independent accompaniment, the design of which involves the persistence of a thematic linea-The function of this kind of accompaniment, beyond affording a foundation to the general structure, appears to be not to aid the expression of the vocal parts at particular points (as in the case of the independent accompaniments of Handel), but to impart a certain prevailing character to the whole expression, as well as to aid in giving unity to the general effect. One important result of this kind of accompaniment, when it attends fugal writing, is to add to the complexity of the general effect. We find, in the fourth place, cumulative harmonic effect which forms an important factor of the whole. That all this involves strong contrast of colour-what we may term phenomenal richness-it is unnecessary to say.

The effect is crowded to confusion, but crowded with elements of splendour; the utterance is somewhat spasmodic, but at the same time thrills with fire.

It is interesting to compare this with the Handelian method of fugal choral writing. In the latter style of effect we find that the modulations are comparatively few, whilst they are deliberate as to manner; we find obviously simpler combinations; we find also harmonic progression often majestic, yet always the servant of either the thematic or rhythmic design. With less frequent modulation and simpler harmonic effect, how then does Handel consummate expression both protracted and weighty? How is he enabled to fill in his space with effect both striking and varied? In the first place, his subjects, however characteristic and forcible in expression they may be, are also always well calculated both for imitation and for unfolding counter-thematic effect. Again, his counter-theme or themes, whilst working smoothly with the subject or with one another or both, possess a distinctive individuality of form which is perceived clearly under all circumstances-

With these means of elaboration alone, Handel produces protracted utterance, having both marked character as well as considerable variety of expression. Notwithstanding the structure of harmony and the manner of modulation are both simple, a full stream of changing effect is produced. Imagery, expressive and clear, is, so to speak, carved out of comparatively homogeneous material.

An essential condition of success in this style of at—the power of emanating subject—was, moreover, with Handel a specialty, his power of devising themes striking and characteristic being pre-eminent. The most promiscuous glance over Handel's oratorios betrays a multitude of subjects standing out in such independence of character and graphic expression as render them landmarks in art. Some are highly melodic as well as instinct with special expression, as in the case of the following, which, being broken into phrases having a certain completeness, notwithstanding they are each an integral part of the subject, is peculiarly favourable for polyphonal effect—

Fall'n is the foel

WhiIst others have a picturesque suggestiveness, as in the following examples—

The wa - ters were ga - the	r-ed,
No. 20.
The floods stood up-right, stood upright as an	heap,
0 4	The floods stood

Entering into this power of devising subject, but less conspicuous in the purely fugal portions of his choruses than where the parts are in plain harmony, Handel betrays a great and special faculty, which, in our opinion, is a distinctive mark of genius in music—viz., the rhetorical instinct. This feeling for displaying sound in plain massive effects having broad rhythmic design, and embracing the following elements of utterance—viz., massive stress, accent and phrase-design, is perhaps the greatest and highest thing in Handel. It renders him independent of special richness in harmonic combination as well as in harmonic change; through it he unfolds a poetry of pure form which does not require colour.

If the reader refer to the first of the last series of illustrations, he will find the illustration is continued to the words "But as for His people." Our object in including the subject to the above words was to point out Handel's instinct for phrase-design—for musical effect having a strong character of utterance—and also his power of effective contrast of theme. If the reader now refer to the last illustration, to the words "The floods stood upright as an heap," he will find that the last three bars involve an example of what in modern parlance is called "tone-painting." He will also again observe striking contrast of theme.

Now in the first of these examples we have pathos in both melody and harmony, contrasted with declamatory effect; in the second, we have a graphic picture of the uplifted depths, not only in their massiveness, but suggestive also of their light surfaceplay. And the foundation of all this is nothing more elaborate than the scale, the common chord, and a simple harmonic succession. The workings of these various powers relating to thematic form, combina-tion of themes, and rhetorical design, Handel so arranges and marshals as to produce effect-full, varied, and protracted-whilst employing but the simplest harmony. With far less phenomenal splendour to his hand than the modern composer enjoys he still attains full and vivid expression both in the region of pathos and that of the picturesque. This is but one more illustration of the old truth, shown in dramatic art in the instance of Shake-speare, that when the language of an art is once clear-its fundamental elements of form once defined-nothing but idea is absolutely essential to its attainment of the highest reach of effect. It is scarcely necessary to refer to those well known merits of Handel's structure-its being well within vocal resources and its involving even display of the parts. It may be said, on the whole, that Handel's utterance is potent, if not passionate, never spasmodic, and largely dramatic.

We make no apology for returning again and again to the subject of reform in the method of writing music to be placed in the engraver's hands; for if the desire of a composer is really to speak to the whole of the civilised world in one language, the more clearly it expresses his intentions the better. The true system of noting the minor scale, the indefinite meaning of many signs so constantly used, the absurdity of covering the paper with Italian words to indicate a method of performing a passage which should be sufficiently indicated by the passage itself, have already been ventilated in our columns; but the important matter of time-signatures, as far as we can remember, has not been mentioned. What are termed "simple times" are now sufficiently shown; for by gradually getting rid of the old sign "C"—originally the circle which represented "triple" or "perfect" time, cut in two to indicate "even" time, as most students know—we are enabled to write the figures 4, 2, or 3, according to the divisions of the bar. But when we come to "compound times," our manner of noting them causes endless confusion: for, utterly disregarding those divisions of the bar which, as we have said, are obvious to the merest tyro in "simple time," we place a number at the top which signifies the quantity, and not the grouping, of the notes contained in the bar; so that whether, for example, 6 means twice three, or three times two, is a matter for after discovery. Were these "compound times" noted, as they should be, according to the number of dotted notes in each partition of the bar, even moderate executants, instrumental or vocal, would at least accent their music properly; and we should not be able to record such a case as occurred to ourselves, in which a vocalist, holding a good position as a teacher, after vainly trying to sing a song in 6-8 time, and exhausting every method he could devise to keep with the accompaniment, told us that we should be able to get on very well "if we were to count three."

ALL musicians know the meaning of the tuners' word "Wolf," but we are indebted to a correspondent in a recent number of Notes and Queries—Mr. Walter W. Skeat—for throwing a light upon the probable origin of the term. The following is the story about it given in Ferne's "Blazon of Gentise" (1586), as cited in the Retrospective Review, February, 1853: "Nature hath implanted so inveterate a hatred atweene the wolfe and the sheepe, that being dead, yet in the secret operation of Nature, appeareth there a sufficient trial of their discording natures, so that the enmity betweene them seemeth not to die with their bodies; for if there be put upon a harpe, or any such like instrument, strings made of the intralles of a sheepe, and amongst them but only one made of the intralles of a wolfe, be the musitian never so cunning in his skil, yet can he not reconcile them to an unity and concord of sounds; so discording alwayes is that string of the wolfe." We are also told that once upon a time a Hindoo stole a wolf's skin, in order to convert it into the head of a tom-tom. His idea was that the sound of his drum would burst the drums of all his neighbours, since theirs were made of sheepskin. We have no doubt that a tuner would laugh at the idea of strings made of the "intralles of a sheepe," and those made of the "intralles of a wolfe," resisting all their efforts to "reconcile them to an unity and concord of sounds"; but the very fact of an antiquarian giving us the result of his researches into the subject is worthy of notice as showing the growing interest in matters musical; and we are glad therefore to transfer Mr. Skeat's communication to our pages.

In perusing the advertisement columns of newspapers, it has often struck us that a collection of the most eccentric of those relating to music might take their place with the many "curiosities of criticism" upon the art which we have from time to time presented to our readers. With this view, we have recently come before us, and selected a few as a first instalment. The following, although somewhat obscure, may at least be accepted by Mr. Curwen as a graceful compliment: "Young Man wishes Instructions in Sol-fa Music, to keep proper time in Playing Harmonium." The next is evidently from one who will spare no expense to be revenged upon those who respect not the truth of the proverb that "walls have ears": "Wanted, self-acting Contrivance (Mechanical Organ, Musical Box, or similar) producing a noise sufficiently powerful to drown Pianoforte Strummings." The third, we are certain, must gladden the hearts of pianists who have long been yearning for a chance of exhibiting their talents before the public at a fair remuneration: "Pianist wanted, for exhibition in City. 15s. per week given." The vocalist who inserts the following advertisement in an American journal, has evidently a good "notion" of profitably employing the hours of rest from his artistic labours: "-, the tenor, wants all of his musical friends to know that he will take a special interest in suiting them in suits, either made to order, or ready made." These are all very practical announcements; but some we find so cleverly and elaborately worded as to make us wonder by whom they can have been written. Here, no doubt, is the solution of the mystery: "INGENIOUS ADVERTISE-MENTS.—A literary man makes it his special study to devise telling and ingenious advertisements. Any subject, topic, or sentiment introduced, according to

Our recent experience at the Birmingham and Hereford Festivals has convinced us that the behaviour of the vast number of persons assembled during the performance of sacred works is now everything that could be wished for, even by the most earnest churchman. We can remember the time when the clamour for seats at the Birmingham Town Hall, and the desecration of the Cathedrals by the holiday-making crowds at the Three Choir Festivals, really threw a slur upon the religious, and brought into prominence the commercial, character of the meetings. These evils, however, have been remedied -and remedied, too, in the best possible mannernot by stringent orders from the Committee that talking could not be permitted in the concert-room, or printed notices from the clerical authorities calling upon all to recollect the sacred edifice in which the music is given, but from the increase of that knowledge of the compositions and their composers which generates respect, and transforms pleasure-seeking audiences into devout and reverent listeners. It certainly may be open to question whether the representation of a musical work set to scriptural text should be regarded as a religious service, so that at certain points every person must rise-especially when such proceeding should call forth the sotto voce observation we overheard, "How much better you can see the dresses when the people stand up": but this is a minor point, and we may reasonably rely upon the good sense of the public to decide this, as it has already decided other and more important matters to which we have alluded. The beneficial effect of these festivals to art, religion, and charity cannot be overstated; and it is gratifying, indeed, to find that every tangible objection to their continued patronage and prosperity has now been effectually removed.

Absurdities are invariably enhanced by contrast with their surroundings, and the following specimens of musical criticism, which would have excited little surprise in a provincial journal, have a positively clipped some specimens from papers which have electrifying effect when they appear in the sedate columns of the Standard, which, in its report of the Hereford Pestival, seems to have given itself up to unrestrained enjoyment of the Horatian maxim Dulce est desipere in loco. Passing over such details as the grotesque epithet "never-tiring," which is applied to "The Messiah," we encounter the succeeding passage: "Mr. Kearton has a fine voice, so like in timbre to Mr. Lloyd's that a blind person might ordinarily mistake the singer, but he lacks the refinement and feeling which his elder brother's experience has given. And so it may be said of Madame Enriquez: and the pathos and feeling which Mesdames Dolby and Patey have always surrounded. This touching passage was wanting in to-day's de-livery." The printer has here co-operated in the happiest manner possible to dislocate the critic's sentiments. But the latter gentleman is, we take it, solely responsible for the startling metaphor contained in the following sentence: "The vocal gem (of the Evening Concert of the 10th ult.) was indisputably won by Madame Albani." Instrumental gems in the shape of musical snuff-boxes, and even musical rings, we have heard of; but this vocal gem is a novel trophy, and we congratulate Hereford in furnishing our great soprano with so unique a souvenir. It need hardly be stated that the regular musical critic of the Standard was in London at the time.

UNDOUBTEDLY the most attractive feature to the general public of the Albert Palace programme has been the Viennese Ladies' Orchestra, which, under the direction of Madame Marie Schipek, has been discoursing light and tuneful music since the first week in August. Clad in their smart red satin hussar jackets and white skirts, they present an appearance so picturesque and effective as greatly to prejudice in their favour all but the ideal critic. It is to be noticed that a sense of the feminine fitness of things has led them to relegate the wind department to a contingent of gentlemen so dexterously disposed in the centre of the band as to be practically invisible. So far as the intonation of some of the brass instruments goes, it were well that they were inaudible also. But on the whole the performance, though singularly wanting in breadth, is decidedly agreeable, and, by wisely confining her forces to the performance of light music, the Conductress has steered clear of the reef of which Herr Strauss ran so foul. Of conducting, in the true sense of the word, there is little or nothing; for Madame Schipek almost always faces the audience, employing her bow as a bâton, save when she occasionally plays a few bars as leader. Her beat, which is graceful and intelligent, seemed—at least, on the occasion of our visit—to be marked by too great evenness, and an avoidance of the tempo rubato which to us constituted one of the chief charms of Strauss's method. Still, in spite of all deductions, we believe it would prove extremely difficult, if not impossible, to "duplicate the lot," as the Americans say, in this country.

OUR contemporary the Globe is probably indulging in mild satire when it quotes the large summer earnings of an Italian piano-organ man (£127) in disproof of the prevalent assertion that the taste for Italian music is dead or on the wane in England. In any case, it is rather rash to assume the character of the music from the nationality of the pianoorgan man. One might, with at least an equal, if not greater, show of justice, argue the demoralising effect of the variety entertainment from the singular plea recently advanced (see Standard of the 3rd ult.) in behalf of a man charged with assault and robbery the first time in his life.

DR. VILLIERS STANFORD'S Oratorio "The Three Holy Children " commenced the performance on Friday morning (the final day of the Festival), under the conductorship of Dr. Richter. The libretto, chiefly from the Psalms of David, the third chapter of the Book of Daniel, and the Song of the Three Holy Children in the Apocrypha, relates to the period of the captivity of the Jews under Nebuchadnezzar, and the miracle of the preservation of the Three Holy Children, who, for refusing to worship Bel, are cast into the fiery furnace by order of the Assyrian monarch. The Oratorio is divided into two parts, the first taking place by the waters of Babylon and the second on the Plain of Dura. The first part commences with an instrumental Introduction in E minor, which, without break, leads to a plaintive Chorus of Jewish Women, the principal theme in which, admirably expressive of the words, has already been heard in the The Chorus is written for two sopranos and Prelude. two altos, the placid character of the accompaniment in the early part being truly sympathetic with the lamentations of the Jewish captives. The music becomes more agitated to the words "For they that led us away required of us then a song and melody in our heaviness," the return to the original theme being extremely effective by contrast, and faithfully shadowing forth the nature of the subject upon which the work is founded. A barbaric March, in the tonic major, now announces the approach of a party of Assyrians, who bid the captives sing them a song of of Assyrians, who hid the captives sing them a song of Sion. The soft voices of the Jewish women, who demur to singing the Lord's song in a strange land, and the harsh enforcement of their command by the Assyrians, conclude this movement with much effect. The soprano solo which follows, in C major, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem," afterwards joined by the female choir, is charming in its melodious simplicity; but, gradually interesting asserts a positive definers is wittend which creasing in energy, a positive defiance is uttered, which is replied to by the Assyrians, in an agitated Chorus, "Down with them," containing some vigorous and effective writing, the triplet accompaniment being suggestive of the subject of the previous March. conclusion of the Chorus the key changes from E minor to the tonic major, in which key the March is resumed, dying off gradually as the soldiers depart. The captives then, in a soprano solo, with chorus, commence another plaintive number, the impressive phrases in which are most sympathetically coloured by the composer, both in the voice parts and accompaniment, a good effect being gained at the conclusion by the recurrence of the words "By the waters of Babylon" to the opening theme, beginning in E minor, and ending in the tonic major. A very fine Chorus, commencing with a brief orchestral prelude, "The heathen shall fear Thy name, O Lord," introduces for the first time the full choir, and contains some contrapuntal writing of a high order, the fugue commencing on the words "When the Lord shall build up Sion" being worthy of much commendation, and a majestic choral phrase, boldly instrumented, effectively terminating the first part of the work. The second part begins with a Chorus of Assyrians, in

C major, an orchestral piece illustrative of barbaric rites and ceremonies, preceding the entry of the voices, on the words "Bel, great is thy name!" A Trio, for the Three Holy Children, in C minor, has some excellent points of imitation; this is succeeded by a repetition of the Chorus, in the tonic major; the Assyrian March is then heard, and a jubilant Chorus on the entry of the King terminates the A herald now, in a bold Recitative, proclaims the royal edict that all who do not fall down and worship the golden image which the King has set up shall be cast into the furnace, the previous Chorus being repeated, as if in confirmation of this decree. An instrumental Interlude, interspersed with choral passages from the Assyrian worshippers, leads to a long scene, the stirring incidents being graphically coloured. A Semi-chorus of Assyrian courtiers commences the number, in which the Three -that he had on that night been to a music-hall for Children are accused before the King of refusing to obey the proclamation. Being threatened with the punish ment already declared, they protest that God will protect them from the furnace. Musically, these events are most decisive and important of the Festival. expressed with fidelity, if not with strong dramatic feeling, the Trio of the Three Children, "Our God whom we serve," beginning in A major and changing to A minor, being especially entitled to praise. In the latter key then occurs a vigorous Chorus, illustrating the rage of the King and the casting of the Children into the furnace, a Semichorus of Jewish women immediately succeeding this, with a reminiscence of the subject of the opening soprano solo forming a most effective climax to the movement. An instrumental Prelude commences the next number, which consists of a long solo for Azarias in three distinct sections. in the last of which the voices of the Three Children are united. The whole of this piece (although unduly lengthened) is replete with true musical feeling. A soprano Solo, and Semi-chorus for two sopranos, two altos, and two tenors, is profoundly religious in style, as befits the subject; and this is succeeded by a Chorus, much of the dramatic feeling of which is depicted in the orchestra, whilst the voices tell of the continual heating of the furnace. A soprano Solo describes how the Angel of the Lord came down into the furnace; and in a long scene, which indeed closes the dramatic portion of the Oratorio, the miracle is described to the King, who eventually directs that the Three Children shall be released, the Choral, "There is no other God that can deliver after this sort," being sung by the people. The eight-part Chorus, "O all ye works of the Lord," which the composer has, we may say, added to his work—although a link is to a certain extent established by one reference to a former theme—contains unquestionably the most learned writing we have yet seen from Dr. Stanford's pen. Commencing with a strict fugue on a bold subject given out by the basses, we have a really fine and scholarly development, responsive phrases between the first and second choir leading to some massive eight part harmony, and concluding with a "Hallelujah" of eight bars, in C major. Dr. Stanford is so well known as an advocate of the Wagnerian theory that we congratulate him upon his strict adherence to form, rhythm, and the many other qualities which belong rather to the creations of the older than the younger exponents of musical art. In his new Oratorio our only regret is that the second part, which affords so excellent an opportunity of displaying invention and vivid dramatic feeling, should be decidedly inferior to the first, in which we really have some charming and melodious writing for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra. The dryness of some of the pieces in the second part, however, must be only slightly dwelt upon in reviewing a really admirable work; and when the composer was called for and warmly congratulated upon the result of his labours, the feeling that the lavish applause bestowed upon him was fully deserved appeared universal. In every respect Dr. Stanford must have been more than satisfied with the manner in which his Oratorio was rendered. Unquestionably the choruses form the best portions of the work; but Miss Anna Williams created a decided effect with the pathetic air "If I forget thee"; Messrs. Maas, King, and Foli, in the music assigned to the Three Children, sang with much impressiveness; and in the small part of the Herald, and afterwards as the King, Mr. Watkin Mills was thoroughly efficient. The whole of the choral parts were finely sung, the fugues especially being given with admirable precision, and the female choir thoroughly realising the composer's intention in the lamentation of the captive Jewish women in the first part.

A memorable performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony formed the second portion of the morning's programme. Herr Richter's reading of this work is now too well known to need criticism here; but, although doubt may exist as to the time in which he takes some of the movements, there can be no two opinions as to his power of ensuring a rendering, both of the instrumental and vocal portions, rarely heard in this country. The manner in which every point-many of which are too often slurred over-seemed instinct with a new life under the conductor's bâton will not be easily forgotten by the spell-bound listeners; and the solo quartet—Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, and Mr. F. King—as well as the choir, are to be warmly congratulated on contributing to ensure

The repetition of Gounod's Oratorio, "Mors et Vita," attracted a large and brilliant audience in the evening, a second hearing justifying all that we have written upon its exceptional power and solemnity, and even bringing the minute details of the composer's elaborate workmanship more clearly before us. This was especially observable in the fine "Dies Iræ"—the masterly instrumentation of which makes a deeper impression upon the hearer to whom it appeals not for the first time-in the "Confutatis Maledictus "—the orchestration of which throughout the movement is marvellous in its combinations and contrast of style-in the three instrumental numbers in the second part; and, indeed, whenever and wherever the complex nature of the score demands from the critical analyst as much earnestness and sympathy with the text as the composer brought to bear upon its conception. The double chorus, alla cappella, was a noble specimen of unaccompanied choral singing, and the many choruses with which the solo voices are associated were given with a careful attention to gradations of tone which fully realised the intention of the composer, and made a profound impression upon the audience. Again Madame Albani's singing was not only perfect in purity of vocalisation, but in that deep feeling which invested every phrase with significance, and conveyed to the listener the solemn import of the words with an eloquence beyond the power of description. Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley sang with the same effect as on the first performance of the work, Mr. Santley's declamatory solos being delivered with excellent voice and true artistic fervour, and the choir and orchestra thoroughly sustaining the high reputation fairly won during the progress of the Festival.

After the singing of the National Anthem, Herr Richter -whose personal as well as artistic qualities have gained him the esteem of all with whom he has been brought into contact in Birmingham-was called forward and positively overwhelmed with applause, the members of the chorus presenting him with a large lyre, formed of flowers. Then Mr. Stockley received an ovation, a compliment thoroughly deserved when his zealous and indefatigable work with the choir is considered; and we wish it could be added that Mr. Stimpson, the long-tried organist, who presided with so much judgment at the organ during the Festival, had been similarly recognised; but, being out of sight, we fear that he was also out of mind; and he must rest content, therefore, with the consciousness of having performed his duties to the satisfaction of all whose good opinion is worth securing.

In looking back upon the results of this great Festival, we have no desire to re-criticise the works which have been submitted to judgment. Their merits have been fully, and we trust fairly, discussed; and it remains only to congratulate all concerned upon the rich legacy which Birmingham has this year bequeathed to art. For a decrease in the receipts, as compared with the last meeting, all were prepared; and, indeed, considering the depression of trade, the wonder is that so large a sum was realised; for, although the accounts are not yet made up, we are informed by the leading local papers that, including donations, the total to be handed to the General Hospital. though not so much as in 1882, will be very nearly equal to the usual amount. To the composers whose genius has so nobly upheld the high character of these Festivals: to the executive artists who have given such effect to their inspirations; and to those whose indefatigable exertions in the work of preparation and supervision so effectually smoothed the way for united action, the sincerest acknowledgments of all art-lovers are due. Personally, too, we must not omit to thank the many in official positions who materially helped to lighten our labours, and proved that the due performance of their onerous duties during an exceptionally arduous week may be tempered by uniform courtesy and kindness.

THE HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL. (BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

No more decisive proof of the special attraction of the Three Choir Festivals could be afforded than the continued success of that at Hereford, which, always occurring immediately after the great meeting at Birmingham, would, were it considered a pretentious rival instead of a friendly ally in the cause of charity, inevitably be subject rather to comparison than criticism. Happily those who give their patronage and support to the Festivals of the Three Choirs are chiefly drawn from a class of music-lovers resident in or near the Cathedral towns where these performances take place; and the periodical recurrence of such impressive renderings of the greatest sacred works within the walls of the greatest sacred edifices is, therefore, anxiously looked forward to, in spite of those musical gatherings on a more extended scale in concert-rooms, which can now be reached by a railway journey in a few hours. Hereford, ever since the opposition to these meetings, has taken the lead in manifesting, by the erection of triumphal arches and the display of flags throughout the main streets, a deep interest in its triennial Festival; and on the present occa-sion quotations from the works of the standard composers were added to many of the principal decorations, a daily open-air performance by a military band on a covered stand in the High Town being also organised by the energetic and zealous promoters of the Festival. Acting on a suggestion of the Mayor (Mr. J. H. Morley) a church parade of the various Trade and Friendly Societies took place on the Sunday preceding the Festival, and a procession of about 1,200 persons marched to divine service in the Cathedral, a special sermon appropriate to the occasion being preached by the Rev. Prebendary Phillott.

by the Rev. Prebendary Phillott.

On Tuesday morning, the 8th ult., the Festival—the r62nd of the Three Choirs—commenced with an early church service in the Cathedral, the Mayor and Corporation, with some of the City Magistrates, proceeding to the building in state. The musical portion of the service was sustained, as usual, by the three Choirs, the Venite being chanted to Purcell's setting, as were also most of the Psalms. The Te Deum and Benedictus were sung to Colborne in C, and Tallis's Responses were used. The Anthem was "Great is the Lord" (Ouseley), the Quartet being well rendered by members of the Hereford Cathedral Choir. The sermon, preached by the Rev. Prebendary Poole, touched but little upon music, save in allusion to its mighty power as an aid to charity. With a recollec-tion of the remarkable discourse upon art and artists which was delivered as the Festival sermon by the Rev. Canon Knox-Little at Worcester last year, we cannot say that we were disappointed at this; for we can scarcely regard the pulpit as the place from which laws should be laid down as to what music ought to be.

A few passing remarks only are necessary in speaking of A few passing remarks only are necessary in speaking of the Cathedral performance of "Elijah," the work chosen for the first morning of the Festival. The principal vocalists were Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley, valuable aid being given in some of the continuation of certed music by Miss Hilda Coward, Mrs. Andrews, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Stanley Smith. All the solo music went well; but grandly impressive as Madame Albani always must be when heard alone, we could wish that when associated with others she would exercise sufficient control over her magnificent voice to prevent its overpowering those of her fellow artists. The choruses were sung with commendable precision throughout, especially "Yet doth the Lord see it not," "Thanks be to God," and "He watching over Israel"; and Dr. Langdon Colborne is deserving of much praise, not only for conducting the work with care and precision, but for taking the movements, with very few exceptions, in the right time, and steadily preserving it.

Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio" commenced the Concert at the Shire Hall in the evening, after which the first novelty of the Festival, "Saint Kevin," a Cantata composed for the occasion by Dr. Joseph Smith, was performed. Dr. Smith is, we believe, a Professor at the new University of Ireland, and organist at the Roman Catholic Cathedral of Dublin. It may be questioned whether the composer was wise in challenging criticism upon a work of such dimension before he had mastered the art of instru-mentation, and formed for himself a style of the past, those responsible for the management of the Festival leads us to ask with whom the choice of works rests. It is natural enough that a young composer should be glad of any opportunity of getting a Cantata well rendered by principals, band and chorus; but this pardonable ambition ought to be controlled by the judgment of those who have a duty to perform to the public; for, although it is good that a student should receive a lesson by listening to his music, so that faults may be revealed which do not appear so clearly upon the paper, that lesson should not be given in the Shire Hall at Hereford, during a Three Choir Festival. Undoubtedly the legend of Saint Kevin-which tells us how a young monk, tempted by the love of a maiden, from whom he attempts to fly, eventually saves himself by hurling her, shricking, into a lake—espe-cially as poetically related by Gerald Griffin, is scarcely a subject to choose for a Cantata in two Parts; but the defects of a libretto may be partially concealed by the skill of the composer; and it is a matter of regret, therefore, that Dr. Smith, instead of writing a series of movements, the music of which seems to have but little relation with the words, did not see how these words could be sympathetically coloured, so that the tale, simple as it is, should be aided, rather than obscured, in its effect upon the listeners. It may be imagined that we should scarcely draw attention so prominently to "Saint Kevin" (which we presume to be the first important work of its composer), did we not perceive in it very decided indications of a talent which might still be cultivated to good purpose: indeed, despite the faults of over-ambition and inexperience, there are many parts of the Cantata—especially in the choruses—which show a decided feeling for dramatic effect, when considered as abstract music. We will not attempt to analyse the work, but may mention that the opening chorus, illustrative of a summer eve in "Luggelaw's deep-wooded vale," is appropriately placid and melodious, the treatment of the lines commencing "Soft gloom fell from the mountain's breast" being extremely happy. The long scene which follows contains much to admire; but the pieces are destitute of form, and wander about so vaguely amongst the keys that the ear is distracted, and seems to need that repose which the hero of the work vainly seeks when flying from the find but irrepressible Kathleen. The orchestral intermezzo, "descriptive of the sleep of Kevin," commences well, but is too long; and the chorus which concludes the first part is merely a succession of disconnected passages. Better writing begins the second part—a pastoral chorus, with an attractive theme, being succeeded by a soprano solo, "What hasty foot has early been?" which is really charming in its grace and elegance, and was so delightfully sung by Miss Anna Williams as to elicit the warmest applause from an audience too glad to welcome any melodious and unpretentious number in the work. laboured music follows this, with, however, occasional passages which, although over-elaborated with crude instrumentation, give evidence of the composer's innate musical faculty. One decisive feature in the Cantatathat of employing "those distinctive peculiarities which belong to Irish National Melody"-must be alluded to, especially as this local colour is sometimes extremely effective, the instrumental Intermezzo founded on the Irish air traditionally associated with the legend, affording a grateful relief after the restlessness of many of the preceding numbers; and the Hibernian flavour pervading the melodious soprano solo already alluded to being felt as thoroughly appropriate. Dr. Smith conducted his work with commendable decision, and at the conclusion of the performance was much applauded. The principal singers— Miss Anna Williams, Messrs. Harper Kearton and Brereton-exerted themselves most successfully in the young composer's cause; and the choir, although occasionally slightly out of tune, was firm in the attacks, and earnestly watchful of the bâton throughout. The presentation of the third and fourth movements of Mozart's Symphony in D (No. 5), at the beginning of the second part of the programme, had very much the effect of exhibiting half the picture of a great painter. Of course what was heard of the Symphony, like what would be seen present, or future, which at least might be understood, if not commended, by musical listeners. This, however, is a personal matter; but the acceptance of his composition by vated musical taste, were thoroughly satisfied. The rest of the selection comprised songs by Madame Enriquez, Messrs. Harper Kearton and Brereton, an excellent rendering of Smart's part-song, "Ave Maria," by the Bradford Choir, and Wagner's March and Chorus, "Hail, bright abode," from "Tannhäuser."

A larger number of persons attended the Cathedral on Wednesday morning to hear Gounod's "Redemption" than had been known at any single performance during many Festivals. The rendering of the work for the first time at Hereford created the utmost interest, and the impression produced by this great tone-sermon upon the listeners, in a building consecrated to the preaching of Christian truths, was indeed a convincing proof of the all-powerful eloquence of music. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Bereton, Miss Hilda Coward ably assisting in some of the concerted music, and the parts of the Penitent and Impenitent Thief being well sung by Mr. ing in some of the concerted music, and the parts of the Harper Kearton and Mr. Stanley Smith respectively. solos were in too safe hands to need more than a passing word of admiration upon the manner in which they were given; but the effect of the choruses depends so much upon the quality of the choir and the baton of the Conductor that, in justice both to Dr. Colborne and the fine body of voices under his direction, we must say that seldom indeed have we heard the great choral pieces with which the work abounds more accurately or more sympathetically sung. The fine climax of the second Part, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," was a noble specimen of precision and unexaggerated power; and in the more subdued choruses the tone of the choir was most evenly balanced. The effect of "The Redemption," which has now been played at the whole of the Three Choir Festivals, will not be speedily forgotten in Hereford.

The evening programme in the Cathedral comprised Spohr's "Last Judgment," with Madame Albani, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley as the principal vocalists, and Bach's Cantata "A Stronghold sure," which was given with Mr. Otto Goldschmidt's additional accompaniments, written for the Bach Choir. Spohr's Oratorio was finely sung throughout, and produced a profound sensation; a great feature in the work being the Duet "Forsake me not," by Madame Albani and Mr. Lloyd, which was most perfectly rendered. The solos in Bach's Cantata were well given by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Brereton. The choruses, too, were admirably sung; but the invitation to join in the choral "Ein' feste Burg" was not responded to by a single individual. It must be mentioned that on this occasion persons were admitted into the aisles on payment of a shilling, a wholesome concession to the general public of which we need scarcely say a very large number availed themselves.

Thursday morning's performance commenced with the now celebrated "Stabat Mater" of Antonin Dvorák, the rendering of which, at last year's Worcester Festival, created such a sensation. It is unnecessary again and again to record the impression made upon us by the fascinating and truly original music of this work; but we must say that the quartet "Quis est Homo," the choruses "Eia Mater" and "Tui nati vulnerati," and the solo "Inflammatus," familiar as they were to us, revealed on this occasion new beauties, and upon the many who heard them for the first time created an effect too evident to require audible demonstration. It would, of course, be absurd to say that the innumerable minute touches of genius so prominently brought forth under the composer's bâton at Worcester were fully realised at Hereford-indeed, we must candidly affirm that there were very many defects both in the band and choral parts—but the wondrous power of the music asserted itself, in spite of these shortcomings; and, the difficulties of the work considered, Dr. Colborne may fairly congratulate himself upon the result. The solo parts were rendered by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley with a success which it is unnecessary to record; and the choir, although, as we have indicated, betraying occasional signs of the want of sufficient rehearsal, sang with an evident appreciation of the high character of the music. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" formed the second part of the morning's selection, and was admirably given throughout. The orchestral movements were exceptionally well rendered, and again the choir was heard at its best. Of the solo vocalists—Miss Anna Williams and Mr. E. Lloyd—we need not speak; but the singing of Miss Hilda Coward in the duet with Miss Williams, "I waited for the Lord," evidenced not only a sympathetic voice and cultivated style, but the possession of that natural musical feeling which cannot but charm all artistic listeners.

At the evening Concert in the Shire Hall, after a spirited performance of Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas," Mr. C. H. Llovd's "Song of Balder," written expressly for the Festival, was given, under the conductorship of the composer. The work, scored for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra, is founded upon the legend of the death of Balder, the God of Light, Peace and Day, who was slain by Höder, the blind old God of Darkness and Night. From the sleep of death, however, he awakens to gladden the world again with his presence. This story, which although illustrating the phenomena of day and night, may, of course, have a deeper meaning, as stated in the analysis of the work, has been treated in very musical verse by Mr. Frederic E. Weatherly, and effectively fitted for the composer's hand by its natural division into two parts-sorrow at the death of the god, and faith in his return. A brief and appropriate instrumental movement in F minor-in which the prevailing theme of the first part is announced precedes the entry of the voices, commenced by the altos, on the word "Balder," and replied to by the basses. The soprano solo begins on the pathetic reiterated exclamation "Dead!" and is afterwards effectively woven in with the chorus, accompanied by some bold orchestral figures. expressive soprano phrase, to the words "Let the hills sigh," answered with points of imitation by the chorus, and the constant repetition of the burden of the movement "Balder the beautiful is dead," show that the composer has wisely sought rather to give an appropriate musical colouring to his theme than to furnish an abstract specimen of his technical acquirements. An instrumental movement passing into F major unites the two sections of the work, the declamatory soprano solo, "Lift up your hearts," commencing the vocal part with much effect, and leading to a melodious phrase, responded to by the chorus. At the change into A flat major we have some very charming orchestral passages, sometimes combined with the chorus, and sometimes independently, giving much brightness to the words of the text, a good use being occasionally made of the leading theme of the first movement, now in the major key. The final chorus is extremely well written, and brings this clever and thoughtful Cantata to an effective conclusion. Mr. Lloyd, who conducted his composition, and was warmly applauded at its termination, has undoubtedly made one more firm step in advance, and may be emboldened, we hope, by his success, to devote himself forthwith to some work in the higher forms of art. The important soprano solo was admirably sung by Miss Anna Williams, and the choruses throughout were every-thing that could be desired. The programme also com-prised the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin "Sweet Bird" (sung so well by Madame Albani, with flute obbligato by Mr. Barrett, as to be encored, which she flute obbligato by Mr. Barrett, as to be encored, which she responded to by giving Gounod's "Ave Maria," founded on Bach's First Prelude), a smoothly written part-song, "Twilight," for eight voices, by Mr. C. L. Williams, the Madrigal "Flora gave me fairest flowers," excellently sung by the Bradford Choir, and songs by Madame Enriquez, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Brereton, the Concert concluding with Weber's "Jubilee" Overture.

On Friday morning "The Messiah" was given, the principal yearlists, hairy, Madame Albais, Wise, Appendix Appendix Proposition of the Prop on Friday mothing The Messian was given, the principal vocalists being Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Brereton, and Mr. Santley. No innovations upon the established custom of presenting this work have to be recorded; and we have only therefore to say that in every respect the Oratorio was finely rendered, not the slightest symptom of fatigue being observable in band, solo vocalists, or choir.

A Chamber Concert at the Shire Hall, in the evening, concluded the Festival. The programme was highly interesting, including Beethoven's Quartet in C minor, Op. 18; Haydn's Quartet in D major, Op. 64; both of which were finely played by Mr. Carrodus (first violin), Mr. Val Nicholson (second violin), Mr. R. Blagrove (viola), and Mr. C. Ould (violoncello); an effective Romance and Tarantelle, for violin, by Berthold Tours, excellently rendered by Mr. Carrodus, and encored; and a Duet, for two violins, "Larghetto and Rondo," by Spohr, in which Mr. Carrodus was ably assisted by Mr. Val Nicholson. In the vocal department, the great effect of the evening was made by Miss Hilda Coward, who sang so charmingly Goundd's song "When in early morn," as to elicit an enthusiastic encore, to which she responded by giving an equally finished rendering of Ganz's "Nightingale's trill," which again roused the audience to a burst of applause such as is rarely accorded to a stranger at the Three Choir Festivals. Songs were also successfully given by Madame Enriquez and Mr. Harper Kearton, the Bradford Choir again giving evidence of excellent training in some glees and part-songs.

The collection at the doors of the Cathedral has fallen somewhat below that at the last Festival; but it is believed that donations still may come in, and that the Charity will receive the usual addition to its funds. Whatever may be the pecuniary result, however, there can be no doubt that Hereford has, on this occasion, thoroughly sustained its reputation. A really fine orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus, solo vocalists who stand at the head of the profession, and an exceptionally good and reliable choir, have exhibited their powers in the interpretation of high-class works with a success which must place these meetings of the Three Choirs on a firmer basis than ever. It is true that little novelty has been produced; but experience has proved that it is safer to trust to the tried works of the past than to the untried works of the present, unless great care is exercised in judging of compositions; and especially when it is possible that "local interest" may creep in to bias the

In taking leave of the mi sical portion of the Festival, we must bear testimony to the general ability displayed by Dr. Langdon Colborne—who, it must be remembered, is called from his organist's seat to become a Conductor once in three years—to Mr. Done, who presided at the organ in the Cathedral in the morning; and to Mr. C. L. Williams, who accompanied at the pianoforte in the Secular Concerts, and at the organ on the second evening, in the Cathedral. For the general arrangements no thanks can be too great to the Hon. and Rev. Berkeley L. S. Stanhope, Honorary Secretary, and his indefatigable assistant, Mr. Capner, the personal exertions of both these gentlemen, even during the progress of the Festival, contributing materially to the success of the meeting.

THE CHORAL COMPETITIONS AT THE ALBERT HALL.

In spite of obvious defects of management, an always interesting and often delightful entertainment was furnished by the competing choirs who took part in the contests in the Albert Hall, organised by the Council of the Inventions Exhibition, on the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 4th ult. It is not our intention at so late a date to add anything to the discussion of the question of abstentions, or the alleged inadequate notice given to metropolitan societies; but we may be permitted to endorse the suggestion that on any similar future occasion the names of the conductors, the numbers of the choirs, and the titles of the admitted extra pieces should be included in the programmes. The names and reputations of the six gentlemen chosen to act as judges were an ample guarantee for thorough competence and impartiality: Mr. E. Prout (chairman), Mr. Eaton Faning, and Mr. Arthur O'Leary serving on Tuesday and Friday; and Mr. Henry Leslie (chairman), Mr. W. A. Barrett, and Mr. McNaught relieving them upon Wednesday and Thursday. If, in one or two cases, their decisions did not fall in with the popular verdict, it is worth remarking-apart from the teaching of any such cynical maxims as that the majority are generally wrong-that errors in detail, such as the missing of an entry, imperceptible to the great bulk of those present in a building of the dimensions of the Albert Hall, but detected by the trained ear of an experienced musician, seated in the most advantageous spot and with displayed considerable feeling in their rendering of Sulli-

A good notion of the closeness of the competition in Class I. (for large choirs of not less than 100 mixed voices) may be formed from the fact that, when the marks were added up, only four out of a maximum of 450 divided the conflicting claims of the Burslem Tonic Sol-fa Choir and the Nottingham Philharmonic Society, to the latter of whom, a remarkably fine body of upwards of 200 voices, the first prize of £100 was eventually awarded. The test pieces were Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen?" and Morley's "Fire! Fire!" and it is worthy of remark that the Burslem Choir sang these and their extra piece entirely without notes. Of the remaining seven competing choirs that of the Birmingham Musical Association came next. Curiously enough, the greatest descent in pitch was achieved by the Manchester Choir, who by no means did justice to their Lancashire lineage. It would certainly seem as though choral had not kept pace with instrumental development in that county.

In Class II. (choirs of mixed voices, not less than fifty or more than 100) there were as many as thirteen entries, the victory of the Hanley (Staffordshire) Glee and Madrigal Society proving no surprise to those who had remarked the roundness and richness of voice, the balance and ease which this choir displayed in Converso's madrigal, "When all alone," and the piece of their own choosing, Gounod's "Come unto Him!" They seemed to have a greater "Come unto Him!" They seemed to have a greater natural gift for singing than any of their competitors, though for intelligence, expression, and rigid maintenance of pitch we preferred the rendering of Mendelssohn's Psalm, "Judge me, O God," given by the Sheffield Tonic Sol-fa Association. This familiar piece proved by far the severest test of the capacity for correct intonation on the part of the choruses, and, let us add, of the artistic conception and intelligence of the Conductors, some of whom took such liberties with the tempi as entirely to destroy the dignity of the whole. There could be no question of the superiority of the two choirs already mentioned, and that hailing from the Vale of Clwyd, over all other competitors, and but for an unlucky infringement of one of the regulations the last-named Association would actually have received the second prize. The error was such a venial one that the Committee recommended the Council to make a special award of £20, a suggestion that was at once carried out. In the sonority of the male voices and clearness of enunciation this choir was second to none, and their only error in judgment was the choice of an extra piece—"The Lord is a lamp" (Benedict's "St. Peter")—which tested the intonation and endurance of the soprani somewhat sorely. Owing to the infringement already mentioned, the Sheffield Choir took the second prize, the third being awarded to the Portsmouth Temperance Choral Society. This chorus was distinguished for sweetness rather than strength of tone, and for excellent pronunciation, qualities which were exhibited to great advantage in Webbe's "When winds breathe soft." Among the remaining choirs a word of notice is due to the Chesterfield Harmonic Society (who sang entirely without notes), the Peckham Tonic Sol-fa Choir, and the Temperance Choral Society (Strand), the two last-named being noticeable for the fine quality of the female voices. One choir alone had the misfortune to make a false start, a failure partially due to the carelessness of the Conductor, but mainly on account of its figuring last on the judge's list.

On Friday, the 4th ult., proceedings opened with the performance by the Redhill Drawing-room Class of the selected test-pieces for Class IV. (choirs of female voices not less than thirty or more than fifty), "Hope and Memory' (Smart) and "The Shepherd Boy" (Carl Hering). As their's was the only entry, the Redhill Drawing-room Class had to be content with the barren meed of a commendation, the circumstances of their appearance gaining for them more sympathy than their lack of spirit and faultiness of intonation would otherwise have entitled them to. In Class VI. (choirs of men's voices not less than thirty or more than sixty), the Leeds Choir were superior at all points to their antagonists from Southsea and Preston. finish, balance, quality of voice, and intelligence, this choir reached a very high level. The Preston Orpheonic Society song "Our ship now goes" with humour and spirit. But their intonation was at times imperfect, and De Rille's "Martyr of the Arena" imposed a greater strain upon the altos than they could conveniently bear. The Southsea Choir suffered from an indistinctness of enunciation and a lack of resonance in the altos and tenors, which thoroughly justified the decision placing them below their Northern

In Class V. (choirs of men's voices not less than sixty) it was impossible not to feel sympathy for the popular disappointment at the verdict which gave the second prize to the London Male Voice Club. Of the superiority of the Carnarvonshire singers (Arvonic Male Voices) there could not be much doubt, for in addition to the intelligent phrasing, distinct enunciation, spontaneity and spirit, which they shared with their compatriots from Rhondda, they displayed a truly remarkable quality of voice, brilliant and sympathetic, which fairly carried away the audience. In finish and correctness of intonation the London Male Voice Club left little to be desired, but in phrasing, distinctness of enunciation, and spirit, they seemed decidedly inferior to the Rhondda Male Voice Society, who in their turn were only surpassed by the Arvonic voices in the richness and brightness of their quality. Moreover, while the London choir chose a short and easy piece as their own selection, the choice of the Welsh singers was in each case excellently adapted to test their vocal capacity and intelligence. In this class the test pieces were Beale's "Come, let us join the roundelay," and Spofforth's "Come, bounteous May.

In conclusion, we have to remark that, considering the drawbacks which beset such an undertaking, the management are certainly to be congratulated on the response which their overtures received. The entries may not have been entirely representative, but it speaks wonderfully well for the enterprise and public spirit of provincial associations that they should have sent up their choirs to compete for prizes which afford no adequate remuneration when the expense of bringing a hundred or a couple of hundred persons from Wales, or Nottingham, or Yorkshire has to be taken into account. But at least they could find no fault with the heartiness of their reception, or the applause that greeted their efforts. Mutual profit cannot fail to result from such encounters if conductors will only avail them-selves of the opportunities of observation. Southerners cannot fail to have been struck by the obvious advantages resulting from the common practice among the Northern and Welsh singers of dispensing entirely with their notes; and in refinement and correctness of pronunciation the Northerners have not a little to learn from their Southern antagonists. The recent performance has given us food for reflection in many ways. It has served to exemplify the extraordinary inability of the English audience to look after its own interests. On Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday, there was a really fine gathering of auditors in the Albert Hall, but instead of frequenting the balcony, or better still the topmost gallery, which a contemporary naïvely describes as "by no means a bad place," they were all congregated in the arena-the worst place of all-and the stalls. A few bold spirits ventured to these supernal regions, where they were rewarded by a real treat during the performances of such choirs as those of Hanley, Leeds, Nottingham, and many others. They might be also seen in the intervals grappling with the mysteries of the "temporary label," or endeavouring to reconcile the contents of a case with the erratic description of them to be found in the catalogue.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

BEYOND occasional amateur and "benefit" Concerts, which are generally more for the purpose of gratifying the performers than furthering musical taste and culture, it cannot be said that our season has yet actually commenced.

We have already announced the sketch programme of the Philharmonic Society, whose first Concert was to take place on the 29th ult., too late to be commented upon in this letter. From the particulars now published of this Society's work for the ensuing season, our first impressions | will assuredly not be neglected in them.

van's glee "The long day closes," and sang Hatton's Tar's are fully confirmed in that the items selected, whilst ample in number and importance, do not comprise any large works—and few instrumental compositions—which may be looked upon as novelties. It is to be regretted that the advantages possessed by our premier Society, particularly in regard to their renowned Hall, and their orchestral Hall, and their orchestral facilities, should not be utilised in the introduction to Liverpool of such works as "The Rose of Sharon" or "Mors et Vita," There is a reflection somewhere which should be removed if Liverpool is to keep pressing forward in the van of musical progress.

Ambition again characterises the advance prospectus of the Birkenhead Subscription Concerts, which are to commence on November 11. The performances will be chiefly instrumental, and the list of artists is pregnant with talent, including Madame Norman-Néruda, Miss Dora Shirmacher, Mr. Charles Hallé, Mons. Pachmann, Herr Straus, Signor Risegari, and the Heckmann Quartet. The vocalists comprise Miss Hope Glenn, Miss Marian McKenzie, Miss Clara Samuell, and Mr. Redfern Hollins.

The prospects and intentions of the Philharmonic Choral Society still hang fire, and with the continued depression in trade, and the expected political excitement which the early elections are likely to involve, it is now improbable that a complete series of Concerts will be given.

The same considerations have led to Herr Richter's decision to abandon the idea of any provincial tour until the spring, and the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which had been arranged with the above Society, will therefore necessarily have to be deferred.

The Wavertree Choral Society is doing a good work within its own limited compass, and announces a series of three Concerts to be held during the season at the Wavertree Town Hall. At two of these it is intended to give Cowen's "Rose Maiden" and Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," and with the sterling reputation which the Conductor, Mr. Fred. W. Pinckney, has acquired in the profession, we may anticipate a thoroughly satisfactory rendering of these works.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (From our own Correspondent.)

THE musical storm which signalised the closing days of August has naturally been followed by a musical lull during September, and the month's record is, consequently, a somewhat meagre and unimportant one. There have been no Concerts yet of the first order, and no musical event of greater interest than the first production here of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Mikado," touching which it will probably suffice now to remark that its success in Birmingham, has been quite as decided as in the Metropolis, and that it has been performed nightly to overflowing audiences.

On the 22nd ult. a new Service of Song, written for the occasion by the Rev. Kipling Cox, was performed in the Town Hall for the first time by a choir of 700 juvenile voices, of the Church Temperance Society, with organ accompaniment, and, on the 28th ult., Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," followed by a miscellaneous selection, was given by a band and chorus of nearly 400 performers for the benefit of Mr. T. G. Locker, a well-known and esteemed local music teacher. These, with one or two minor events of purely local interest, constitute the month's musical record.

But if the past has been barren, the future is full of promise, and the musical season upon which we are just entering is likely to be an active and interesting one. First in order of date, as well as of artistic importance, comes the annual Subscription series of Messrs. Harrison, whose first Concert is fixed for the 6th inst. Among the vocal artists who will appear in the course of the series are Madame Patti, Madame Albani, Miss Griswold, Miss Robertson, Madame Trebelli, Madame Patey, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Maas, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, and Mr. F. King; whilst the interests of instrumental art will be championed by Mr. Hallé, Signor Bisaccia, M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Papini, M. Musin, M. Hollman, Signor Bottesini, M. Lasserre, and Mr. Hallé's admirable band. The programmes of these Concerts are, for the present, "a sealed book"; but the claims of classical art The Birmingham Festival Choral Society, as usual, makes a special feature in its prospectus of the principal novelties produced at the late Festival, to which the three first Concerts are devoted. On the 8th inst. the selection will comprise Dr. Villiers Stanford's "Three Holy Children," and Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages," Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" will be performed on November 26, and Gounod's "Mors et Vita" at the third Concert, on March 4. Mr. Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," composed for the Norwich Festival of last year, will furnish the subject-matter of the fourth and final Concert on April 15, 1886. The band and chorus, under the conductorship of Mr. Stockley, will be on the usual complete and efficient scale, and the array of principal vocalists secured is a large and brilliant one, including, among others, Madame Valleria, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hone Glenn, Mr. E. Llovd, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli.

Next in order comes Mr. W. C. Stockley, the able choirmaster of the Birmingham Musical Festival, who is now in a fair way of accomplishing for local instrumental art, what he has long since done for choral art in Birmingham, by the creation of a really first-class band of local instrumentalists. It is about twelve years since Mr. Stockley first came before the public as an orchestral conductor on his own account, though he had long been accustomed to conduct the bands of the Festival Choral, and other Societies with which he was connected, and he soon succeeded in making himself as much at home with instrumental performers as with vocalists. His band now numbers eighty skilled players, mostly local musicians, but supplemented in some sections by a few picked London instrumentalists, and Mr. Stockley has already succeeded in imparting to it a unity, precision, and perfect balance of parts which many Metropolitan organisations might envy. For the coming season, four Orchestral Concerts are announced, commencing on the 22nd inst., and at each Concert an entire Symphony will be produced, including one by Beethoven, one by Schumann, Mendelssohn's A minor, and the new one in F, by Mr. Prout, produced at the last Birmingham Festival. Raff's Italian Suite is mentioned among the orchestral selections, and the vocal music will be in the hands of Miss Elly Warnots, Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Maas, and Signor Foli.

The Philharmonic Union, after suffering temporary eclipse, shows signs of life again, and announces three Concerts, at which the "Elijah," "Judas Maccabæus," and a miscellaneous selection will be given, under the direction of Dr. Swinnerton Heap.

The Midland Musical Association, under the conductorship of Mr. H. M. Stevenson, promises four Concerts, at which "Judas Maccabæus," Mr. Moore's "Torfrida," "Samson," and the "Creation" will be performed.

The Musical Section of the Midland Institute is more

The Musical Section of the Midland Institute is more than usually active this season, and, besides establishing a local school for music, consisting of cheap classes for singing and the various wind and string instruments and theory of music, it announces four Concerts, at which recitals of pianoforte and violin music will alternate with madrigal singing. The new musical classes have already attracted a large number of students, the elementary violin class numbering nearly 200, the solo singing class for ladies over 100, and the pianoforte class for ladies nearly as many. At the elementary singing class, the attendance on the first evening exceeded 300. It is scarcely necessary to remark that this new development of the curriculum of the Institute is looked upon with anything but favour by the private music teachers of the town, who have already had to bear their full share of the burden of bad trade, and cannot possibly compete in penny lessons with the Institute.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER. (From our own Correspondent.)

THE dawn of our musical life and activity is now fast approaching, signs of vitality are appearing all around; and, although no positive announcements of any great consequence are yet made—no developed buds are yet formed and exhibited—rumours full of promise for the winter are whispered about, and genial breezes, promising fertility, are warming and cheering the lovers of music.

Mr. Hallé, who demands first attention, will recommence his series of twenty Subscription Concerts on the last Thursday in October; but no outline of his intentions has yet been published, although it is carnestly hoped that some novelties, and especially those successful at the recent Birmingham Festival, may be produced here.

Mr. de Jong will resume his Saturday Evening Concerts, and has engaged for the first a strong body of solo singers and players. The Working Men's Concerts (also under Mr. de Jong's direction) will continue, on alternate Saturdays, to afford our local aspirants opportunities of displaying their acquirements, and of gaining confidence and experience. A similar series of Popular Concerts is now announced for Monday evenings, so that it will be the working man's own fault if he does not become, at least mildly, musical.

At the Concert Hall the scheme inaugurated last season will be continued, with the advantage of the knowledge then gained of the usefulness and popularity of afternoon recitals. Probably those attractive and social gatherings will be extended in character as well as in number.

The Athenæum will, towards the end of October, celebrate its jubilee, each of its very successful Societies entertaining some of the 3,000 members of the institution one evening during a festival week. The Musical Society will, of course, be prominent, and will show its specialty of refined rendering of vocal part-music, as well as its promising young solo singers.

The Vocal Society has been revived, but with divided allegiance, the title being claimed by two choirs, respectively under the control of Mr. Henry Watson and Mr. John Towers. It is to be hoped that both sections will profit by the careful training thus secured, and advance our local part-singing.

Mr. Cross will display his old energy and pluck as one of the captains of our Tonic Sol-faists at his Saturday Concerts at the Association Hall in Peter Street, and the smaller and more private suburban Societies will continue their exertions in spreading a love of vocal music and discipline among their members.

Apart from the strictly Manchester musical doings, we have had one short week's performances of the Carl Rosa company. Repeating, as Mr. Rosa seems to incline to do here, much music that is not only old but also old-fashioned (which is quite a different thing) we, nevertheless, were afforded another interpretation of Goring Thomas's "Esmeralda" with its freshness of melody and powerful ensemble writing, and the work has taken a yet deeper hold upon the popular esteem. "Manon" was given twice, not in a style by any means beyond reproach; still it charmed crowded audiences, and excited a desire to hear it under more favourable circumstances. When Mr. Rosa returns to Manchester he will, we hope, not only give us a performance of "Nadeshda," but organise his band upon a more liberal scale. It is hardly fair to condemn a provincial audience, in every respect as discerning and musicianly as his metropolitan patrons, to repetitions of "The Bohemian Girl," &c., or to present those new works with which we are eager to become practically acquainted, with an incomplete or unpractised band. Much of the success of the very best work must depend upon an adequate rendering of the orchestral effects, upon the swing of a strong corps of instrumentalists sufficiently familiar with their parts to enable them to play with vigour and confidence. And, greatly as we-for our own sakes-desire Mr. Rosa to modernize his provincial répertoire, still, in justice to our rising composers, I must caution amateurs against accepting certain crudenesses and thinnesses of tone as exact fulfil ments of the intentions of the authors. I write this in all kindness and goodwill to one who has spiritedly and perseveringly striven to establish regular and systematic performances of "Opera in English.

Musical examinations, both privately of students and publicly of choirs, are fashionable here just now. The list issued by the Society of Professional Musicians shows a remarkable success; and for the forthcoming contests at St. James's Hall there are, I hear, very many entries. Altogether a vigorous winter season here seems to be promised.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE forthcoming musical season, so far as Yorkshire is concerned, promises to be unusually interesting, if one may judge from the announcements which have already been made. Not only are the old Societies preparing for the winter with renewed energy, but new musical combinations are coming forward with much enterprise, and the next few months are likely to be crowded with musical events. Moreover, the quality of the promised productions is likely to be in proportion to the quantity.

In Leeds there are signs in every direction of awakening zeal. The Chamber Concert scheme, which was commenced a few years ago by Mr. J. Rawlinson Ford, has attained a degree of success which promises well for the future. Six of these Concerts will be given during the forthcoming season under Mr. Ford's auspices, and the subscribers will have the advantage of attending them in the Coliseum. This building, it may be remembered, was inaugurated on the occasion of the recent visit of the Prince of Wales, who was entertained at a banquet given there by the authorities of the Yorkshire College. It is capable of seating an audience of at least double the number of persons who could be accommodated in the Victoria Hall, and its acoustic properties are unexceptionable. The attractions offered by the promoter of the Chamber Concerts are powerful. Among other artists whose services have been secured are Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Joachim, Mr. Carrodus, Miss Shinner, Mr. Otto Peiniger, M. Saint-Saëns, Mr. Charles Hallé, Signor Piatti, and M. Jules de Swert; Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Hope Glenn, Mrs. Hutchinson. For two of the Concerts which are to take place in January the full band, conducted by Mr. Manns, has been retained, with Herr Franz Rummel as solo pianist, and Mr. Carrodus as solo violinist.

An interesting series of Musical Evenings has been announced to take place at the Philosophical Hall. performances will consist of Chamber Music, and will be sustained by Mr. Edgar Haddock and Mr. Fred. Dawson, the latter a young planist who, as a boy, not many years ago, was quite a prodigy. The series of Concerts numbers ten, and will be given weekly. Each programme will comprise a grand Sonata for pianoforte and violin, a solo for each of those instruments, and a duet for both. In addition to Sonatas from the works of many masters, Beethoven's masterpieces will be largely drawn upon for the pianoforte; and Mr. Haddock's violin solos will include, amongst others, selections from the works of Veracini, Locatelli, and Leclaire, many of which are said to be hitherto unknown in this country. The programmes include in nearly every instance one or more compositions entirely new to Leeds audiences.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society presents an attractive programme, though the merit lies rather in the names of the principal artists than in the nature of the music selected for performance. "The Rose of Sharon" is the only work in the prospectus to which the term novelty may be applied. The Concerts, like most of those announced to take place in Leeds, will be given in the Coliseum.

In addition to the arrangements to which reference has been made, Concerts of some importance will be given by the Amateur Orchestral Society, the Armley and Wortley Choral Society, the Leeds Temperance Choral Society, and other well-known organisations.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts Committee announces a series of fourteen Concerts, the first of which took place on the 22nd ult., and was in the form of a grand Handel bi-centenary night.

In Bradford the Subscription Concerts will again take precedence in point of interest, although the committee have not much in the way of novelty to set before their patrons. The season will open on the 30th inst. with a repetition of Berlioz's "Faust." Miss Mary Davies and Mr. Lloyd will again undertake the parts with which their names are associated, but a new Mchistopheles is promised in the person of Mr. Henschel. The programme of the second Concert will comprise Chamber Music, in the performance of which the following are announced to take to study the composition; part—namely, Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Risegari, no lack of exquisite singing Herr Straus, Signor Piatti, Herr Paersch, Signor Preatoni, enthusiastic audiences.

and Mr. Hallé; Madame Valleria will be the vocalist. An equally interesting event of the course is that announced for December 11, when Madame Albani will be the vocalist, and Mr. Halle's full orchestra will perform, among other works, the instrumental music of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." Cherubini's Mass in C and Benedict's "St. Cecilia" are promised for the fourth Concert, Miss Thudi-chum, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Watkin Mills being engaged for the principal parts. A Ballad Concert will be given in February, 1886, and will be specially attractive by reason of the appearance of Señor Sarasate, Signor Bottesini, and Mr. Cusins. The concluding Concert will afford another opportunity of hearing Herr Joachim, and afford another opportunity of hearing Herr Joachim, and will introduce to a Bradford audience Mr. Winch, the American tenor. Mr. Misdale, one of our most skilful and enterprising pianists, has put forward another attractive list of Chamber Concerts. Under his auspices will be performed Dvorák's Trio in B flat (Op. 21), Goetz's Trio in G minor (Op. 1), Raff's Piano Suite in E minor, and a host of similar works likely to interest connoisseurs.

The Bradford Amateur Orchestral Society, which came into existence last season, under the able leadership of Mr. George Haddock, promises to become of much musical service to the town. The Society consists of lady and gentlemen amateurs, and already has a membership forty strong.

The Manningham Vocal Union, whose competent efforts, under the leadership of Mr. Rooks, were duly noted last season, will enter upon its fourteenth session with a performance of Randegger's "Fridolin," and the list of works to be rehearsed during the season includes Dvorák's "The Spectre's Bride" and Cowen's "The Rose Maiden." Another programme of considerable importance is that of the Bradford Festival Choral Society, which includes Gade's "Psyche" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Altogether the prospect afforded by the announcements referred to, and by those of numerous other organisations of which Bradford can boast, is a very agreeable one, and proves that the musical life of the town is vigorous as ever.

An interesting choral competition took place on the 18th ult. among the children attending the Bradford Board Schools. The local educational authorities have of late paid special attention to the development of music in their schools, and, by way of encouragement, has instituted prizes of considerable money value for distribution among competing choirs of Board School children. Sight-singing tests were applied, and rehearsed performances were adjudicated upon. The judges were Dr. Stainer and Mr. W. G. McNaught. Dr. Stainer, in the course of some remarks, deprecated the system adopted by some Boards of employing special music teachers, and added that the competition had proved that school-teachers could teach music admirably.

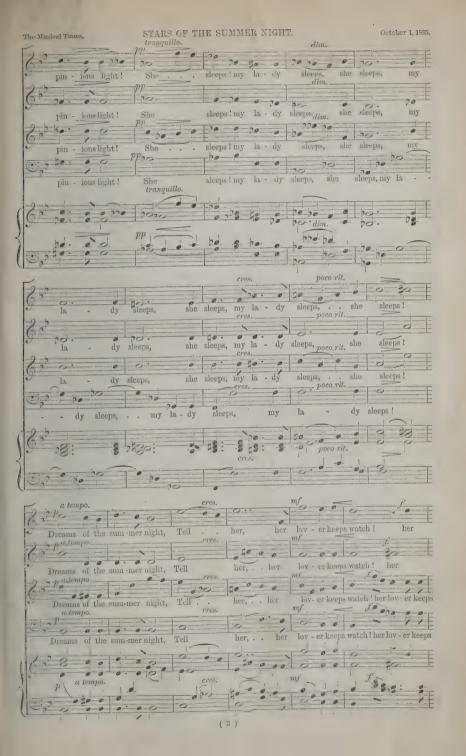

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THE celebration of the fifth Triennial Bristol Musical Festival is now close at hand, and naturally arouses a good deal of interest in the city. The dates fixed are the 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 23rd inst. Strenuous efforts are being 21st, 22nd, and 23rd inst. made by the Festival Committee to render the undertaking a success, and certainly, so far as vocal "stars" are concerned, we have nothing to complain of. With such names as Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Santley before us, we may rest assured that the solos, at least, will receive full justice, and we have frequently observed that, to some extent generally, and in Bristol more especially, it is to these that general audiences look for their chief pleasure. Nor is this fact hard to account for, as a solo is easier of comprehension to a certain extent, and less complicated than the work of a chorus or a band, and appeals more easily to the general ear, which is not, we fear, as a rule, a highly educated one, musically speaking. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the bulk of the audience go simply to hear the singer, and not to study the composition; and as there will certainly be no lack of exquisite singing, there ought to be crowded and enthusiastic audiences. The Festival Committee have again engaged Mr. Charles Hallé and his band for the week; and the programme is to be as follows:—Tuesday morning, Handel's "Belshazzar"; Tuesday evening, miscellaneous Concert; Wednesday morning, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; Wednesday evening, miscellaneous Concert; Thursday morning, Berlioz's "Faust"; Thursday evening, miscellaneous Concert; Friday morning, Handel's

There is very little music besides the Festival in prospect at present. We are glad to see that the promoters of the Saturday People's Concerts have decided to renew their praiseworthy efforts during the coming season, and, in tact, have already done so, as the first Concert was given on the 26th ult. The aim of these gatherings is to bring good music within the reach of all classes, and the crowded audiences are extremely gratifying, though, considering the merely nominal price of the tickets, it is perhaps scarcely to be wondered at that the finances of the Society are not in a very satisfactory state.

The Monday Popular Concerts will probably not be renewed before Christmas, and the Committee has decided to reduce the number of them to six this season, this being the result of the inadequate support accorded to them. Having sustained a heavy loss on the nine Concerts given last season, which necessitates drawing upon the reserve fund to the amount of £200, the Committee naturally do not feel justified in incurring so large a risk again.

Two grand Amateur Concerts, under most distinguished patronage, were given at Salisbury on the 9th ult. by Mr. Augustus Aylward, organist of St. Thomas's, in aid of the restoration fund of the church. The Concerts were a great financial success, the room being filled on each occasion, and a handsome sum will be realised. vocalists were Lady Simeon, Mrs. Harcourt Coates, Miss Farebrother, and Mr. Alec Marsh, all being most successful in their respective songs, and gaining encores. Mr. Alexander Rowland played a marvellous solo on the contra-bass, and Mrs. Scott Siddons gave four recitations with the greatest success. The orchestra, numbering fifty performers, played with great effect the Overtures to "Fidelio," "Il Barbiere," and "Cosi fan tutti," two movements from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, and March from "Athalie," &c. The accompanists were Mr. T. E. Aylward, Mr. A. Aylward, and Madame Rosa Keenig. Mr. Augustus Aylward conducted, and received quite an ovation at the conclusion of the Concerts.

The Concert season at Salisbury will include Mr. Augustus Aylward's third popular orchestral Concert in November, with Mr. C. Fletcher and Madame Rosa Koenig; the Sarum Choral Society's second Concert of the season, the first week in December (Mozart's "Twelfth Mass" and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion"); and St. Martin's Choral Society's second Concert of the season in December—Conductor, Mr. Augustus Aylward.

At Exeter, the Orchestral Society gave its second Concert on the 26th ult. The Victoria Hall Organ Recitals will begin on the 3rd inst. Mr. Farley Sinkins will give two Subscription Concerts on the 16th inst., morning and evening, and on the 28th inst. Mr. Brandram will recite "The Midsummer Night's Dream," and Mendelssohn's music will be rendered by members of the Western Counties Musical Association. The last-named Associa-tion will give, at its Annual Festival, Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake," and an Orchestral Selection.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

THE dead calm which has prevailed in our musical circles is drawing to an end, and the announcements already made promise an interesting musical season for Edinburgh.

An event which claims prominent notice is the visit of Herr Richter and his famous orchestra, who will appear for the first time in Edinburgh on the 28th and 31st inst. It is gratifying to hear that, from a pecuniary point of view, there is a good prospect of success, many subscriptions having already been promised. To all lovers of music these Concerts cannot fail to prove an unaccustomed treat. As may be supposed, the programmes consist largely of Wagner's compositions, and will include the Overtures to | Mr. James Allan.

"Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhäuser," Vorspiel to "Parsifal," the Walkurenritt from "Die Walkure," and the Introduction to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger." Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 5 and 7 are also comprised in the Miss Lena Little will be the vocalist, with songs of Glück, Mozart, and Handel; and Herr Ernst Schiever will lead the orchestra.

Early in the season a grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert will be given by Mesdames Agnes Zimmermann and Antoinette Sterling, Signori Papini and Bottesini. This Concert will be followed by the annual Recital of Mr.

Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda.

Mr. Lambeth's Select Choir from Glasgow will give a Concert of part-songs, principally Scotch; Mr. Hartley's Edinburgh Choir announces "Elijah"; and the Carl Rosa Opera Company will give a season of two weeks at the Lyceum Theatre.

The Choral Union will introduce for the first time in Edinburgh, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's highly successful Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," with the composer as Conductor. The Society also promises Haydn's

It is probable that Mr. Hueffer will, by arrangement with Messrs. Paterson and Sons, give three Lectures upon Modern Music.

In the course of the winter a number of other Concerts are already in view, including Mr. Waddell's Chamber Concerts, a performance by his ladies' orchestra, and a rendering by his Choral Society of Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride."

Herr Otto Schweizer intends to give a Pianoforte Recital, and Mr. Franklin Peterson his annual Organ Recital.

THE Glasgow Choral Union's scheme of Concerts for the ensuing season is as follows:-The season will extend from December 7, 1885, to February 13, 1886, ten weeks in all. Thirteen Subscription Concerts will be given, four of them choral and nine orchestral. The Choral Concerts will comprise performances of the following works, in their order :- Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon" (conducted by the composer), Handel's "Messiah," Costa's "Eli," Dvorák's new Cantata "The Spectre's Bride." particulars of the orchestral music to be performed have yet been announced, but it is understood that the programmes will include some important new works. usual Saturday evening Concerts will be given during the season, the selections at these being, as a rule, hardly, if at all, less high toned than those on the Subscription nights. The following vocal soloists have been engaged :- Madame Albani, Madame Valleria, Hutchinson, Madame Clara Samuell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Joseph Maas, Holberry Hagyard, Watkin Mills, Bantock Pierpoint, W. Ludwig, and Signor Foli. The solo instrumentalists are:—Piano, Miss Clotilde Kleeberg, Madame Anna Mehlig, and Herr Franz Rummel; violin, Herr Stanislaw Barcewicz and Mr. J. T. Carrodus. Engagements are pending with other distinguished artists. The orchestra will consist of about eighty performers, and Mr. Manns will conduct, as before.

The programmes of the two Concerts to be given here on the 27th and 30th inst., by Herr Richter's Orchestra, have been issued. At the first Concert will be played three selections from Wagner-Overture to "Tannhäuser," Introduction to Act III. of "Die Meistersinger," and Vorspiel to "Parsifal," the same composer being equally fully represented at the second Concert in the Overture to "Die Meistersinger," Introduction and closing scene "Tristan und Isolde," and the Walkürenritt from "Die Walküren." There will be a Beethoven Symphony at each Concert; No. 7 in A, and No. 5 in C minor; Liszt and Weber being the remaining sources drawn from, in the "Hun-garian Rhapsody," No. 1, of the former, and the "Oberon" Overture of the latter. Miss Lena Little will be the vocalist. An encouraging number of subscriptions have already been received. The Glasgow Select Choir has elected Mr. J. Miller Craig, of Edinburgh, as Conductor, in room of the late

The Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society was started in 1870. It had for Conductors, first M. Méhul and latterly Signor Zavertal, now of Woolwich. It practically ceased to exist some four or five years ago, but has now been revived in amalgamation with the Southern Orchestral Society, and under the old name. Mr. W. T. Hoeck, who has shown special aptitude for training amateur orchestras, has been chosen Conductor. Several excellent players, in all the departments, have joined the Society, some lady violinists among the number. Among the music to be practised during the session are Haydn's Symphony Letter Q ("The Oxford"), and Schubert's No. 8, in B minor; the Overtures "Don Giovanni" (Mozarl), "Prometheus" (Beethoven), "Son and Stranger" (Mendelssoln, "Ossian") (Gade), and several other selections of equal

The City Hall Saturday Evening Concerts began for the season on the 19th ult. The standard usually attained at these Concerts is hardly of the highest, but the entertainments, at the least, help to allure large numbers of the working-classes from grosser pleasures, and serve thereby a decidedly useful end.

Dr. A. L. Peace continued his Organ Recitals in the Cathedral during last month, the series having closed for the present on the 28th ult.

The Partick Musical Association, of which Mr. Hugh McNabb has the direction, will take up Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," together with Zingarelli's "Laudate" and other short pieces for its first Concert during the winter.

The Ruthergien Choral Union, conducted by Mr. Macintyre, has selected Sullivan's "On Shore and Sea"

The Glasgow Southern Boys' Choir, which has made excellent progress since its institution three years ago, under Mr. Hugh McNabb, is to take up Behrend's humour-ous Cantata "The Ghost" as the principal piece this season. The Kyrle Choir, which is under the care of Mr. Allan Macbeth, will resume the season's practisings in October. For the first two months or so the members may probably be occupied in learning a number of part-songs, glees, &c., with which to give Concerts to the humbler classes, throughout the town, in keeping with the aim of the Society, of which the Choir forms a part. They may very likely take up one larger work and prepare it for performance in March or April, but what the work may be is not yet

The Crosshill Musical Association are to practise, with a view to performance, at their first Concert, a new Cantata, MS., by their Conductor, Mr. A. Patterson, entitled "Hohenlinden," the book being the well-known lines of Thomas Campbell.

A fine suite of rooms, suitable for Concerts and other public meetings, has been opened here, under the name of the Waterloo Halls, the larger hall having seats for 2,000 persons. The rooms are in a central position in the City, and will, doubtless, be very much in request. It may be mentioned that the buildings (which are in the Greek style of architecture) were originally occupied for Christian worship by Wellington Street United Presbyterian Church, the congregation having lately migrated westward, like so many others in our city.

A portion of Gounod's "Mors et Vita" is to be sung in Linlithgow Abbey, by special permission of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., sometime in November or December next, by the choir of the church, under the direction of Mr. James T. Finlay, the Organist. The choir, entirely male voices, and numbering forty-two, will, on the occasion, be altogether independent of extraneous assistance, and the accompaniment will be by organ alone. The choir of this historically interesting church gave a performance, similar in character, of "The Redemption" a year or two ago.

The Paisley Choral Union will perform this season Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and F. H. Cowen's new Cantata, "Sleeping Beauty." The Glasgow Choral Union orchestra will play the accompaniments to at least the former work, and appear at an instrumental Concert. A Ballad Concert will be given in November, at which will be A Ballad sung some part-music, under the baton of Mr. James Barr, the Honorary Choral Trainer of the Society.

At Bridge-of-Weir, near Glasgow, the Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Carrick, will produce Birch's "Merry men of Sherwood Forest."

At Bridge-of-Allan, the important Spa in Stirlingshire, F. H. Cowen's "Rose Maiden" will form the subject of study by the Choral Association, conducted by Mr.

The Ayr Choral Union will perform Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" at its first Concert this season. The Musical Association of Girvan, a town a few miles further south in the same county, will study Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and Handel's "Zadok the Priest," together with a selection of choruses, anthems, and partsongs. Mr. Hugh McNabb is the Conductor of the two

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

New York, September 14, 1885. In the larger cities of the United States preparations are making for the musical season, which will open about a month from now. The scale of these preparations in New York and Boston (more particularly the former) indicates a season of unparalleled activity. Indeed, here the question which is confronting the public is not, "What and how much are we to have?" but, "How are we to find capacity for all that is projected?" I have not verified the estimate, but it has been stated that from beginning to end the season will contain 210 days, and that for these 210 days 350 performances of sufficient merit to command attention from the musical writers for the newspaper press are already booked. New York will be called on to patronise opera in German, English, and Italian, the latter, of course, if Mr. Mapleson succeeds in effecting a lease of the Academy of Music, for which he is negotiating. he will do so there does not seem to be much doubt.

The principal facts in connection with the German season at the Metropolitan Opera House, I observe, have already been printed from time to time in the news notes of The Musical Times. The season will consist of thirtynine subscription nights and thirteen matinées, commencing on November 23 and ending on March 6, with an intermission from December 19 to January 4, during which time the company will give representations in Philadelphia. time the company will give representations in Philadelphia. The repertory is the most ambitious yet undertaken in New York, and comprises "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengtin," "Die Walküre," "Die Meistersinger," "Die Gotterdämmerung," Goldmark's "Königin von Saba," "Der Prophet," "Faust," "Die Jüdin," "Aïda," "Carmen," "Gioconda," with, possibly also, "Meficstofele," "Huguenots," "Masaniello," and "Der Fliegende Holländer." The preliminary subscriptions are exceedingly promising, having reached within three weeks after the opening of the books, a sum three times as large as the total subscriptions for last season. The prelarge as the total subscriptions for last season. The preparations making at the house amount to a guarantee that, as spectacles, the operas will leave nothing to be desired. Less certainty is felt by connoisseurs touching the musical department. Not one of the principal sopranos is known here except Auguste Kraus, the wife of Director Seidl, who was in the company last season, and made many admirers by her whole-hearted performances, and the freshness of her still youthful voice. But Madame Kraus's ambition and zeal exceed her wisdom, and she shows a strong desire to attempt rôles for which nature did not equip her, and which, if persisted in, will surely ruin her voice before long. Fraulein Lilli Lehman, the leading soprano, is of course known by reputation, but on the part of those who follow closely the careers of operatic artists, there is a question whether her recent endeavours to cope with such dramatic rôles as Brunnhilde and Valentina are not confessions of that vocal degeneration which tyranny of the German operatic stage is doing so much to further in the land of Wagner. The tenors are unknown here, though the name of one of them, Eloi Sylva, was introduced to the public in a slight degree last year by the customary managerial manipulations. The reports that have reached amateurs about Herr Albert Stritt, of the Grand Opera House at Frankfort, are not such as to excite great curiosity concerning his vocal abilities, though all agree that he is a magnificent actor. It is at least an interesting coincidence, in these days of poverty in tenors, that the principals in both the German and English New York companies this year both come from Frankfort. Herr Candidus is the chief tenor of the English company.

This company will begin a season of representations at the Academy of Music on January 4, which is to include Subscription nights (forty) and Matinées (sixteen), besides ten performances in Brooklyn. The artists engaged are: sopranos—Pauline l'Allemand, Annis Montague, Charlotte Walker, Emma Juch; mezzos and contraltos—Jessie Bartlett Davis, Sara Barton, Helen D. Campbell, Mathilde Phillips; tenors—Charles Turner, Alfred Paulet, Charles Thompson, William Candidus; bassos—John Gilbert, Myron W. Whitney, M. O. Lonsdale; baritones—William H. Lee, Alonzo Stoddart, George

The operas promised are Gluck's "Orphetis," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windson," "Lohengrin," "Huguenots," "L'Eclair," "Faust," "Carmen," "Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," "Lakmé," "Oberon," "Marriage of Figaro," and possibly a work by Rubinstein. I take these facts from advance sheets of the prospectus, which is to be given to the public next week. The enterprise is backed by a formidable list of Society members, headed by Mrs. Thurber, who, for several years, has been playing the rôle of an artistic Mæcenas in this city. Mr. Thomas is announced as the director of its artistic fortunes, and the business management is in the hands of Mr. Thomas's business manager, Mr. Charles E. Locke. The stage manager is to be Herr Hock, formerly of Hamburg, and last year with Dr. Damrosch's German company at the Metropolitan. I will not attempt to forecast the operatic season; from the facts which I have recited English readers will observe that an energetic effort will be made in this city during the coming winter to solve the "operatic problem which has exercised the minds of writers, artists, and managers in all the great countries of the world for several years past. In conclusion, I wish only to add that many serious-minded American lovers of music are watching with no little sympathetic interest the steps which Great Britain is taking in the same direction. They see in the work of such men as Mackenzie, Stanford, Thomas, and their confrères, the harbingers of a time when England will enjoy English Opera, and when her influence will help America out of the humiliation of being obliged to depend for performances in the vernacular upon what is merely Opera in English.

Of the preparations for the Concert season I can as yet add but little to what I described as being in prospect at the close of last season. In one respect, I fear, the coming season will mark a retrogression rather than an advance. The choral performances will be fewer in number, and less interesting in character than those of last year. The Chorus Society will be abandoned, and the Oratorio Society, whose Conductor, Walter Damrosch, will be kept occupied at the Metropolitan Opera House, will give three Concerts instead of four. One of these will be the usual Christmastide performance of "The Messiah." At the other two it is purposed to bring out Berlioz's "Messe des Morts" and Wagner's "Parsifal," the latter, of course, without scenery or action. Since none of the smaller choirs ever do anything of special interest this will limit our opportunities to enjoy choral music to the three Concerts of the Oratorio Society, unless M. Van der Stucken should succeed in a plan which he has formed to organise a choir to co-operate in his second series of Novelty Concerts. It also puts in doubt the question—When and from whom we are to hear Gounod's "Mors et Vita"? At present the talk is of giving it under the direction of Mr. Thomas, with either the chorus of the American Opera Company or the choir of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, next February. performance which the Oratorio will have in this country will be at a Festival in St. Louis, on the 31st inst., under Mr. Thomas's bâton. In February it will be heard, almost simultaneously, in Boston, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn.
The St. Louis Festival will embrace five performances during the last week of October, and Mr. Thomas's orchestra will have the instrumental numbers in hand. was connected.

The occasion of the Festival is to celebrate the opening of a new Music Hall of large dimensions.

The twenty-eighth annual Festival of the Worcester County (Mass.) Musical Association will take place on September 22—25. Mr. Zerrahn, of Boston, will conduct as heretofore, and among the soloists will be Madame Fursch-Madi, Miss Emma Juch; Messrs. Whitney Mockridge, Myron W. Whitney, and D. M. Babcock. There will be 500 voices in the chorus and fifty instruments in the benchestra. The programme is largely taken up with solo performances, but among the music to be sung are Henry Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Macfarren's Cantata "May-Day," Handel's Anther," Macfarren's Cantata "May-Day," Handel's Anther," Zadok the Priest," Selections from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," and Handel's "Messiah." For next year's Festival the managers have in contemplation Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," which it is likely will have its first American performance at Milwaukee this winter, under the direction of Mr. Tomlins.

OBITUARY.

On the 13th ult. there died, at Berlin, after a prolonged illness, Friedrich Kiel, one of the most profound contrapuntists of modern Germany; a composer, moreover, who combined in himself some of the highest attributes of true genius, including that comparatively rare one, in these days, an almost retiring modesty of character. Indeed, it is partly owing to the latter that his name is, as yet, but little known to the musical world generally. Nor did his sterling qualities begin to meet with a just appreciation even in his native country until after the production, in 1862, by the Stern'sche Gesangverein, of Berlin, of his "Requiem" (Op. 20), which, however, raised him at a bound to a position of acknowledged pre-eminence as a composer of sacred music. His career previous to that event had been an obscure but laborious one. Born on October 7th, 1821, at Puderbach, near Marburg, the son of a schoolmaster in humble circumstances, his musical talent soon attracted the notice of the art-loving Prince Wittgenstein-Berleburg, whose generous assistance enabled the young man to adopt music as a profession. He studied first under Kummer, at Coburg, and afterwards (in 1843), under S. W. Dehn, at Berlin, where also he conceived that intense love and veneration for the great masters of church music, more especially Handel and Bach, which determined his subsequent artistic bias. For a number of years Kiel led the quiet and uneventful life of a musicmaster in the Prussian capital, publishing from time to time some of his, then already numerous, compositions, chiefly for pianoforte, which however attracted but little attention. He was already past forty when the above-mentioned performance of his "Requiem" suddenly brought him into fame, a distinction which his subsequent producinto tame, a distinction which his subsequent produc-tions have fully justified. Among the latter may be specially instanced his "Missa solemnis" (1866), his Oratorio "Christus" (1874), and his still more recent Christmas Oratorio "The Star of Bethlehem," out of a number of other works, both for the church and the chamber, for organ solo and for orchestra. In all of these he distinctly moves upon classical ground, while in his compositions for the church he commands with perfect ease and freedom the contrapuntal and polyphonous resources of his great predecessors, without ignoring at the same time the best teachings of modern musical progressqualities which rendered him facile princeps in his par-ticular sphere among his contemporaries. Kiel was elected a member of the Senate of the Berlin Royal Academy of Arts in 1869, and in the same year became a professor of composition at the newly founded "Hochschule für Musik" in connection with that institution. A number of distinguished pupils bear testimony to the solidity and earnestness of his teaching, and his death leaves a void in representative German musical art which will not easily be filled.

AT a recent meeting of the Council of the Accademia di S. Cecilia, Rome, Mr. Francis Hueffer was elected an honorary member (Socio bene merito). This is the oldest of the Italian Academies, and one with which Palestrina was connected.

THE prospectus of Novello's Oratorio Concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, announces what may be regarded as a revival of the performances given under the same title from 1869 to 1875. That the love of sacred music has much deepened within the last few years is unquestionable; but those who watch with interest the progress of the art amongst the people must also perceive that it has materially widened, and that many who exclusively patronised and attended secular performances a short time since are now beginning, not only to appreciate the undying works of the past writers of sacred art, but to study and listen with reverence to the creations of our modern composers who have so successfully devoted their talents to this branch of the art. The exceptional interest of the programmes offered during the season 1885-86 at the Concerts organised by Messrs. Novello cannot, therefore, fail to draw large audiences. At the first Concert, on Tuesday evening, November 10, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Dramatic Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon" will be Dramatic Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon" will be given, Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley being the principal singers; at the second Concert, on December 1, Gounod's sacred Trilogy "Mors et Vita," with the same eminent solosists; at the third, on December 22, Gounod's sacred Trilogy "The Redemption" the solos by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley; at the fourth, on February 2, 1886, Dvorák's Patriotic Hymn, and the same composer's Birmingham Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," Madame Albani, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley being the principal vocalists; at the fifth Concert, on March 2, Dvorák's, "Stabat Mater," a Cantata for tenor solo and male chorus, by Hermann Goetz, and "The Holy Supper of the Apostles," for male voices, by Richard Wagner (for both of which works, given for the first time in London, the Male Choir will be specially augmented); and at the sixth Concert, on April 6, Liszt's Oratorio "St. Elizabeth" will be given. The chorus will consist of about 300 voices, which have been most carefully selected by Mr. Mackenzie himself. The orchestra will include the best performers available, with Mr. Carrodus as leader.

The prospectus of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society for its lifteenth season, 1883-86, promises ten Concerts, at which the following works will be produced: "Mors et Vita" and "The Redemption" (Gounod), "Elijah" (Mendelssohn), "Faust" (Berlioz), "Martyr of Antiothe (Wendelssohn), "Faust" (Berlioz), "Martyr of Antiothe Vita," which will be produced for the first time in London, is announced for Wednesday evening, November 4, and Saturday afternoon, November 14, on both which occasions the Society will have the assistance of Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, who sang originally in the work at the Birmingham Festival. The band and chorus will consist of 1,000 performers, and, besides the artists already named, engagements have been made, or are pending, with Miss Anna Williams, Fräulein Pauline Cramer, Madame Biro' de Marion, Madame Valeria, Madame Patey, Miss Hope Glenn, Madame Florence Winn, Miss Hilla Wilson, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. F. Barrington Foote, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. W. H. Burgon, Mr. Henry Pyatt, and Signor Foli. Mr. Barnby will resume his post as Conductor, and Dr. Stainer will, as usual, preside at the organ.

THE Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society, for the season 1885-6, announces four Concerts, at the first of which, on November 16, Dr. Villiers Stanford's Oratorio "The Three Holy Children" will be given, with Sir George Macfarren's "St. George's Te Deum"; at the second, on December 20, Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; on January 29, 1886, a miscellaneous selection; and on April 5, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and Cherobin's Mass in C. No. 4. The band and chorus will be full and complete, the Conductor being Dr. Swinnerton Heap. The following artists are engaged: Miss Anna Williams, Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Milson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Milson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Wilson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Milson, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Milson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Milson-Osman, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Carlotta Ellio

THE arrangements for the series of Subscription Concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, at St. James's Hall, are now completed. Although there is but one new work promised, Gounod's "Mors et Vita," there are several interesting items in the prospectus, amongst which may be mentioned Sir Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Sir A. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Mr. W. H. Gummings will be the sole Conductor during the season, Mr. Charles Hallé having resigned. The following is a complete programme of the works to be given, with the dates of the Concerts: November 20, Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," Saint-Saëns's Psalm "The heavens declare" (performed for the first time in London and conducted by the Composer), and Beethoven's "Mount of Olives"; December 18, Handel's "Messiah"; January 15, 1886, Mendelssoh; "Elijah"; February 12, Gounod's "Mors et Vita"; March 12, Haydn's "Creation"; April 16, Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater"; and May 7, Handel's "Belshazzar." Engagements have already been made with the following artists:—Miss Anna Williams, Miss G. Griswold, Miss Annie Marfrott, Miss Clara Samuell, Mrs. Hutchinson, Mrs. Suter, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Elanor Rees, Miss Chester, and Madame Patey; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Winch, Mr. Bridson, Mr. Burgon, Signor Foli, Mr. Watkin Mills, Mr. Stanley, Smith, and Mr. Santley.

THE prospectus of the Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts announces twenty-one Concerts on Monday evenings, commencing November 9, and extending to April 19, 1886, and twenty Concerts on Saturday afternoons, beginning November 14 and terminating April 17, 1886. Madame Néruda will be the violinist at the opening Concerts, and Herr Joachim is expected to appear on March 1. Negotiations are pending with Madame Schumann; but, in consequence of the state of her health and other matters, it is still uncertain whether she will be able to accept an engagement. We regret to learn that Signor Piatti, who was seriously injured by the upsetting of his carriage whilst driving to Bergamo from his villa at Cadenabbia, on Lake Como, is still suffering from a fracture of the right arm, and a severe incised wound on the forehead. According to a letter received from Signor Piatti by Mr. S. Arthur Chappell, it can only be after a long interval that the distinguished artist will be able to resume his professional duties. Meantime he desires to acknowledge with sincere gratitude the many marks of sympathy which he has received from his English friends.

The Bromley (Kent) Choral Society, commences its sixth season on Monday, the 5th inst, the works placed in rehearsal being the 137th Psalm (Goetz), and Bach's "God's own time is the best." The Society now numbers over 100 effective members. During the last two seasons the instrumental parts have been played by the Bromley Orchestral Society, now entering on its third year. The latter Society meets every Saturday during the winter months, the first practice being fixed for the 3rd inst. There are now some forty playing members. The works to be rehearsed are "Jupiter" Symphony (Mozart): "Prometheus" Overture (Beethoven'; and "La Sirche" Overture (Auber); Mr. F. Lewis Thomas, as hereetofer, will act as Conductor. A series of six "Concerts for the People" at a nominal rate of admission are projected under Mr. Thomas's direction.

The prospectus of Mr. Spark's Subscription Concerts at the Public Hall, Worcester, for the season 1883-86, promises three Concerts, the first of which will be given on November 12. The following artists are engaged: vocalists—Miss Gertrude Griswold, Miss Amy Sherwin, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Miss Annie Morris-Adams, Miss Marian Mackenzie, Madame Enriquez, Madame Trebelli, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Harper Kearton, Mr. Maybrick, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Barrington Foote; Miss Margaret Wild, Mr. H. W. Wareing, Mus. Bac., and Signor Bisaccia (sole pianoforte): Mr. T. W. Dodds, Mus. Bac. (sole grand organ): M. Hollman (solo violoncello); and Signor Bottesini (solo double-bass). The Conductor at the irrst Concert will be Mr. Sidney Naylor; at the second, Messrs. Wareing and Dodds, and at the third Signor Bisaccia.

THE thirtieth series of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace, under the conductorship of Mr. Manns, promises to be of exceptional interest. At the first ten Concerts, commencing on the 17th inst., the programmes will include Mr. Prout's Symphony in F, composed for the Birmingham Festival; a Concert Overture, "Prospero," by F. Corder (first time of performance); Dvorak's Symphony, No. 2, in D minor (first time at these Concerts); Concerto in G, No. 4, by J. S. Bach, for two flutes, Violin Concertante, and orchestra of strings (first time); a Symphonic Poem, "Liebe und Leben, Kamp und Sieg," by F. Praeger (first time of performance); a Selection from Suite, "Bal Costume" by Rubinstein (first time at these Concerts); Handel's Overture to "Ariadne" (first time); a Suite of Ballet airs "Etienne Marcel," by Saint-Saëns (first time); a Concerto, by Handel, for the harp, with accompaniment for two flutes, two violins (con sordini) viola, cello, and bass, pizzicati (first time at these Concerts); "Capriccio Italien," by Tschaikowski (first time in England); a Scherzo by Goldmark (first time); and Mr. F. Cowen's Birmingham Cantata "Sleeping Beauty," conducted by the Composer. The artists engaged for this series are—vocalists: Mesdames Valleria, Hélene Crosmond, and Biro de Marion, Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Edith Marriott, Mdlle. Pauline Cramer, Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli (her first appearance), Miss Helene Arnim, Miss Annie Layton, Miss Hope Glenn; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Ben Davies, W. Winch, Hirwen Jones, 'Charles Chilley, Thorndike, Mills, Frederic King, and Santley; pianoforte: Miss Fanny Davies, pupil of Madame Schumann (her first appearance), Herr Franz Rummel, Signorina Gemma Luziani (her first appearance), Rummel, Signorina Gemma Luziani (her first appearance), Mr. Max Pauer, Mr. Oscar Beringer, and Madame Frickenhaus; violin: Mr. Carl Jung and M. Stanislaw Bercewicz; clarinet: Mr. G. A. Clinton; flutes: Messrs. Alfred Wells and A Tootill; harp: Mr. E. Lockwood. At the second series of ten Concerts, commencing on February 13, 1886, Antonin Dvorák's Dramatic Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," and Gounod's Sacred Trilogy "Mors et Vita"—both composed for, and performed at, the late Birmingham Essival—will be civen. Grunnd's the late Birmingham Festival-will be given, Gounod's work on a Saturday during Lent; and Beethoven's Choral Symphony will close the season on April 17. Herr Joachim will appear at an early Concert in February or March, and Signor Bottesini will play on February 20. Rarely indeed, if ever, has such an attractive prospectus been submitted to the music-loving public. THE Gravesend and Milton Choral Association has

THE Gravesend and Milton Choral Association has issued its prospectus for the eighth season, 1885-86, which announces that three Concerts will be given. At the first, early in December, Haydn's "Creation" will be performed; the second in February, 1886, will be a miscellaneous selection; and for the third in April, 1886, Cowen's new Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" has been selected with Niels Gade's "Psyche." The weekly rehearsals commenced on Wednesday, the 30th ult., and a successful season is fully anticipated. Mr. Charles R. Green still continues at his post as Conductor, which office he has held with the greatest benefit to the Association since its formation in 1878; the invaluable services of Mr. Howard Moss as accompanist being also retained.

The second season—1885-86—of the Dublin Popular Concerts, under the conductorship of Mr. W. A. Collisson, Mus. Bac., is announced to commence in the large Hall of the Antient Concert Rooms, on Saturday; December 5. Seven Concerts will be given, four of which will be miscellaneous, one will consist of English music, and two of Chamber music. The following artists have already been engaged: Miss Mary Davies, Miss Josephine Yorke, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Edwyn H. Wolseley, Mr. A. McGuckin, Mdlle. Bertha Brousil, and Herr Poznanski (violin), and also several of local reputation.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts (late Highfield Lectures) for 1885-86, to be given at the Town Hall, include Chamber Concerts, at which the best artists will appear, a Concert with orchestra, for which the services of MSaint-Saëns are secured, and several lectures on musical subjects. The first a Handel Bi-centenary Concert, was announced for the 22nd ult., and the second takes place on the 6th inst.

AT the tenth Sunday Afternoon for the People, at St. Michael's Church, Folkestone, on Sunday, the 6th ult., the subject of the address, by the Rev. E. Husband, was "The Sacrament of Music," as illustrated by Gounod's "Mors et Vita." After explaining the true meaning and object of the Sacrament, the Rev. gentleman continued as follows:-"Music, like a great number of other things which I might name, has an outward visible sign and an inward spiritual grace. The outward visible sign is the singer, or the player upon an instrument, the chorus stretching far back to the farthest limits of the great platform; and the orchestra, with its strings and wind instruments, and the great organ towering above them all. The inward spiritual grace is the effect which that music has upon the soul; at one time awing it into a spirit of solemn, reverential worship, at other times into a spirit yearning for a greater knowledge of God and Heaven, at other times into a spirit of supreme joy and gladness. Music can do this! for it not only can touch the emotions, which would be but superficial, but it touches the heart, and the soul, and all that is noble and pure and refined in man's inner nature, so that few can listen to good music without being the better for it. Not that all music is alike in its effects. There is good music technically so, in fugue and counterpoint-marvellous exhibitions of musical mechanism, yet despite all its skill and genius, cold and unsympathetic. And, on the other hand, there is music which, in addition to its correctness, is what I may term heart music. Just as there are clever sermons that fall coldly on the ear and heart, and there are sermons that go straight to the heart, and move it to joy or to tears. Let me give you a striking illustration of what I have called heart music. I mean Gound's new oratorio 'Mors et Vita.' It has been my privilege to be present at the Town Hall at Birmingham at the production of the same composer's sacred trilogy 'The Redemption,' produced three years ago, and now, a few days back, to be present again at the first performance of what the great composer says is a continuation of 'The Redemption,' namely, 'Mors et Vita.' I am not going to attempt a musical criticism of that truly inspired work; but I heartily endorse every word from a review of the work in one of our London daily newspapers, where the writer says, 'Of the eventual popularity I have no doubt-indeed, it is quite likely to be, a couple of years hence, a greater favourite than "The Redemption." Every quality that is most admired in Gounod's music is to be found in "Mors et Vita." It abounds in rich harmonies, and in those sweeping currents of full melody that take the imagination captive. vince to-day is simply to speak of this-I am confident to add-undying contribution to musical art, from what I may term a theological standpoint, and of the effect of its music upon the souls of men. There were a great many novelties at the Festival I have alluded to, many of them an honour to musical art, although, with one exception, I doubt if many of them will retain a permanent place amongst our accepted classics. But not long after the commencement of 'Mors et Vita' a friend turned to me and said (exactly expressing my own feelings)—'This is music.' Its beauty and originality (for though full of the 'mannerisms,' so-called, of its composer, still those 'mannerisms' are all originalities) seemed to speak to our hearts as uninspired music, though perhaps clever and technically irreproachable, fails to do; we felt we were listening for the first time to music that would live for ever, and be loved more and more as time went on. It was heart music, and I was not surprised to see how many were moved to tears as the performance continued, nor surprised that at its close we were too solemnised and awed to descend to an ovation of clapping of hands, which an after-dinner audience gives to a ballad or a comic song. We felt the music was too divine, too sacred for such an ebullition of a noisy custom that marks an unmusical as well as a musical audience. Without doubt the composer of ' Mors et Vita' is the composer of the present day. No one can approach him in melody, or richness of harmony, or power of orchestration. All these are abundant in 'Mors et Vita.' It is one of the most eloquent sermons ever preached on life and death. A pure inspiration, a gem of musical art."

A SECOND carefully revised edition of Mr. Ed. Heron Allen's work, "Violin making: as it was, and is," is, we understand, now ready.

THE cause of Anglican Church Music has sustained a severe loss by the death of Mr. J. R. Murray, more generally known as the founder and choirmaster of the London Church Choir Association. Mr. Murray (who was a pupil of the late Sir John Goss) had much at heart the improvement of Church Music, and a great desire to bring the various London Choirs together as a musical and, if possible, benevolent Association similar to those of Provincial Choirs whose Festivals are held at their diocesan centres, London having been an exception in this particular. supply this need the London Church Choir Association was formed, and the first meeting was held under the presidency of the late Rev. W. C. F. Webber, M.A., sub-dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, and vicar of St. Botolph's, Aldersgate Street. The association has been entirely under Mr. Murray's direction for the last fourteen years, and during that time has succeeded in producing high-class Church music, the aim of the Association being to perform only original compositions at the annual Festivals in St. Paul's Cathedral, and by so doing to encourage musicians to write for the services of the Church. This great work, which to Mr. Murray was purely a labour of love, involved the expenditure of much time, which he could ill afford, and the immense tax on his strength may have hastened his death at the comparatively early age of 49. We are glad to hear that a subscription has been started on behalf of his widow and ten children, who are almost entirely unprovided for, and it is hoped the sum realised may serve both as a memorial to him and as a substantial help to his family who sorely need it. Donations will be gladly received by the Hon. Sec., Mr. W. T. Snell, London and South-Western Bank, Highgate, N.

A MEETING was held on the evening of the 15th ult., at the Grocers' Company's Schools, Hackney Downs, to take into consideration the advisability of forming a Society, consisting of Professional and Amateur musicians in the neighbourhood, having for its objects-(x) The promotion of social intercourse among musicians; (2) The reading of papers followed by discussion; (3) The performance compositions of special interest or novelty; and (4) The ventilation of matters affecting the welfare of the musical profession. The chair was taken by E. Prout, Esq., B.A., who was supported by Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., Organist of the Parish Church; Mr. W. M. Wait, Organist of All Saints, Clapton Park; Mr. Samuel Moore, Organist of St. Thomas's Church, Upper Clapton; and Dr. Gordon Saunders. A provisional Committee was elected consisting of the above-named gentlemen, with the addition of Dr. W. H. Monk, Rev. F. Leach, and Messrs. Bridge, Gray, and Smith, who met on the 19th ult. (Dr. Monk in the chair), and drew up rules, &c., to be submitted to the adjourned meeting on the 6th inst.

In our article last month on the "Historic Loan Collection" it was said that the portrait of Dr. Crotch was lent by Mr. John Gill. This statement should be corrected. At the express invitation of the Exhibition authorities, the Committee of Management of the Royal Academy of Music lent for display throughout the season the highly interesting picture, painted in 1785 by George Romney, of William Crotch, then eleven years old, subsequently Musical Doctor of Oxford, Professor of Music in the same University, a composer of marked distinction, and the first Principal of the Royal Academy from its foundation in 1822. Another loan contributed by the Committee was the portrait of John Fane, sixth Earl of Westmorland, the Founder of the Royal Academy of Music, which was painted by Mrs. Eliza Goodman only two years before the demise of the original in 1860.

MR. J. HERBERT MARSHALL announces four Concerts at the Temperance Hall, Leicester, on October 8 and December 3, 1885, and January 26 and March 9, 1886. The artists engaged are Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Miss Carlotta Elliot, Madame Patey, Miss Helen D'Alton, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. Frederic King, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Franklin Clive; Señor Sarasate, Mr. J. T. Carrodus, and Miss Anna Lang (violin); M. Hollman (violoncello); M. Vladimir de Pachmann, Signor Tito Mattei, Signor Bisaccia, Herr Wilhelm Ganz, and Mr. W. G. Cusins (pianoforte).

MR. J. SPENCER CURWEN has nearly completed a second series of his "Studies in Worship Music," which will be published in the Autumn. This volume will carry on the topics started in the first, which was issued five years ago. There will be several descriptive chapters on Music at the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the employment of music by the Russian Church, the Moravians, the Welsh Calvinists, the Salvation Army, &c., will be treated. An important section will deal with German Protestant Church Music. In the preparation of this Mr. Curwen has paid several visits to Germany. The St. Cecilia movement in the Roman Catholic Church will also be noticed, and there will be a chapter on the relation of music to Sunday Schools, and another on its place in the curriculum of Theological Schools.

GOUNDD'S "Mors et Vita" will be performed during the approaching season by the Albert Hall Choral Society (November 4 and 14), at the Oratorio Concerts (December 1), by the Sacred Harmonic Society (February 12, 1886), Crystal Palace, Birmingham Festival Choral Society (March 4), Brighton (December 4), Nottingham (October 28), Newcastle (March), and Cheltenham. The interest in this work is not, however, confined to England; for, not only are arrangements now in progress for its production by several other Societies in this country, but it will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Cleveland, Toronto, and numerous other places in America.

The prospectus of Mr. J. A. Matthews's Choral and Orchestral Society, at Cheltenham, announces that the following works will be introduced during the season: Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio, "St. John the Baptist," Handel's Oratorio, "Judas Maccabæus," Dr. J. F. Bridge's "Rock of Ages," Mendelssohn's Psalm, "As the hart pants," and Gounod's Oratorio, "Mors et Vita." The first Concert will take place on November 3. Classes for the study of the various branches of music will also be formed, and there will be a singing competition, with examinations, for which prizes will be awarded to the most deserving students.

The International Artistic Society, established during the present year under the patronage of T. Julian Adams, Esq., and the general management of Mr. Ernest A. Williams, announces that during the autumn and winter season as many Concerts will be given as is necessary to introduce its performing and composing members to the London public. The Society also hopes to offer at intervals prizes, to be competed for amongst members, for the best delivery of a Recitation, the best delivery of a Rocitation, the best delivery of a Song, the best MS. of a Vocal Piece, &c. Free advertisements will be given to all members in the officially appointed Journal, which will record all the Concerts and Entertainments of the Society.

On the 14th ult, the Birmingham Sunday School Union Choral Society gave a performance of Haydn's "Creation" in the Town Hall, the band and chorus numbering about 200. The principal vocalists were Madame Lita Jarratt, Mr. A. W. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. D. Harrison. My. Alfred R. Gaul, Mus. Bac., Cantab., conducted, Mr. J. Stimpson presided at the organ, and Messrs Abbott and Ward led the band. The solo vocalists were warmly applauded by a large audience. The choruses were all well rendered, "The Heavens are telling," and the final chorus being much applauded.

The members of the St. George's Glee Union gave their 199th Monthly Concert, on the 4th ult., in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, S.W. The part-songs, which included compositions by Spofforth, G. M. Garrett, Elizabeth Stirling, Pinsuti, Mendelssohn, and Lemmens, were extremely well rendered by the choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Monday. The solo artists were Miss Susetta Fenn, Miss Bessie Diamond, Miss Maud Cameron, Miss Helen Heath, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, Mr. Percy Palmer, and Mr. James Budd. Miss Matilda Crimp contributed a pianoforte solo, and Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte.

THE announcement in our September number that the Free Concerts in Westminster Chapel, James Street, Buckingham Gate, S.W., would be resumed early in October is, we understand, premature, as no arrangements have at present been made.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. C. H. Jolly, for many years Honorary Secretary to the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society. The deceased gentleman, who was in his 55th year, was greatly and widely respected, and his funeral was attended by the Mayor and nearly two hundred persons. On Sunday, the 13th ult., a memorial service was held in the Baptist Church with which he had been so long identified, the Festival Choral Society attending on the occasion and singing, in addition to the ordinary hymns, 'Blest are the departed' (Spoth). The Conductor, Dr. Swinnerton Heap, presided at the organ.

THE Vicar, Churchwardens, Choir, and various members of the congregation of St. Peter's, Fulham, held a meeting, on the roth ult., to present their retiring Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Alfred Long, with a handsome gold Albert, a copy of Blunt's "Commentary," and a written testimony of their appreciation of his four years' untiring labour for the musical welfare of the church. Mr. Long has been appointed Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church of Emmanuel, Forest Gate.

A HARVEST Thanksgiving Festival was held on the 24th ult., at St. Stephen's Parish Church, Camden Town. The service was Parry in D, the organ being supplemented by brass instruments, which were very effective in the processional and recessional hymns. The anthem was "O food my soul thirsteth" by Mr. Frederick R. Greenish. At the close of the service, before the recessional, Dr. Stainer's Te Deum was sung. Mr. A. H. Crowest conducted the choir, and Mr. Jeffreys presided at the organ.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society announces four Concerts for the season 1885-86. The programmes comprise Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ," C. H. Lloyd's "Song of Balder," Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and Italian Symphony, Weber's Concertstück, and a Selection from "Der Freischütz." The rehearsals commence on the 2th inst. The performances of the Society will again be under the able direction of Dr. Bridge.

MR. W. FREEMAN THOMAS, lessee of the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts, has, with the view of encouraging musical talent in this country, offered a prize of twenty-five guineas for an original manuscript Overture, to be the composition of a native of England, Ireland, Scotland, or Wales, and which will be performed at a special Grand Concert early in the present month, when Mr. Sims Reeves and other distinguished artists will appear.

THE Autumn season of the Richter Concerts, at St. James's Hall, commences on the 24th inst. Three Concerts will be given the programmes of which are in the highest degree interesting. Madame Valleria and Mr. Edward Lloyd are the only vocalists announced. The orchestra, of too performers, will be led by Herr Ernst Schiever, Herr Theodor Frantzen is Director of the Chorus, and Herr Richter Conductor.

A VERY successful Concert was given on Monday evening, the 7th ult., at Limehouse Town Hall, in aid of the widow and children of a School Board officer. The vocalists were Madame Clara West, Miss Rose Dafforne, R.A.M., Mr. John Robertson, Mr. G. M. Smith, &c. Pianoforte, Mr. Joseph Speaight; violin, Mr. Maurice Flaum; Director, Mr. H. Bowsher. The hall was crowded with a very appreciative audience.

THE Examinations of the Society of Professional Musicians have been recently held throughout England, and appear to have proved highly successful. On the afternoon of the 21st inst., the Mayor of Manchester (Mr. Alderman J. J. Harwood) will take the chair at the Town Hall in that city, when Mr. F. H. Cowen will deliver the prizes awarded by the Society during the past session.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Lauda Sion" will be performed, with full orchestral accompaniment, at the Royal Military Chapel, St. James's Park, on Sunday the 11th inst., at p.m., under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Precentor of the Chapel.

THE conductorship of the Preston Choral Society (250 voices) has been offered to, and accepted by, Dr. Hiles of Manchester, who has already commenced rehearsing Handel's Oratorio "Samson."

MESSRS. F. LEWIS THOMAS and Wm. C. Hann announce four Chamber Concerts at Bromley (Kent), during the ensuing winter, the date of the first being Oct. 29, Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, Rubinstein's Sonata (Op 18), piano and cello, and a Haydn Trio will be performed at the opening Concert.

THE Exhibition of £10 offered by the Council of the Royal College of Music, to be competed for by candidates at the entrance examination for the Christmas term, was allotted to Emily Marguerite Himing, formerly pupil in the Crystal Palace Company's School of Art, Science, and Literature.

REVIEWS,

The Art of Pianoforte Playing and Teaching. By Maria Louisa Grimaldi. [William Reeves.]

"THE love of music," says the authoress of this work, in her preface, "has become so deeply rooted in England as to render it remarkable that a higher standard of excellence in piano playing has not been reached by the amateurs of the art in a country which is now, moreover, the centre of attraction for all the best professional talent in the musical world." That "defective elementary instruction" is the main cause of this may be true-and we are certainly inclined unreservedly to admit Madame Grimaldi's book as one of the most thoughtful aids to a better understanding of the subject; but when she tells us that not only are there no works which treat on music as Mr. Ruskin's books have treated on painting and architecture, we cannot agree with her; for we could name many, perfectly accessible to all, the perusal of which by those who have the care of the musical education of the rising generation would have a highly beneficial effect upon their efforts in promoting a healthy appreciation of the art in this country. is that "giving lessons" has become so decided a business in England, and, from the keenness of competition, the desire not only to get pupils, but to keep them, is so general, that there is little time or inclination left for a study of those principles which should regulate purely artistic teaching, apart from all commercial considerations. Intellectual professors, such as Madame Grimaldi has shown herself by her excellent treatise to be, must therefore look leniently upon the shortcomings of those who rather teach to live than live to teach, and take heart by the brightness of the present, instead of lamenting over the gloom of what we may hope is the past. In her opening chapter the authoress has some truthful observations upon the necessity of providing good instruction for young children, and the ill effects of engaging governesses who undertake to teach everything. "I shall be very happy to give your daughter 'finishing lessons,'" said an eminent professor to a lady, "but I must begin with her first," and surely this observation might with equal truth be made to ten out of every twelve applicants. The practical remarks on the best methods of training the hand; the necessity of cultivating playing from memory; the advantage of choosing really useful technical exercises; the reference to Chopin and Schumann's judicious use of the pedals; the period of study to which the music of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn belongs-a matter seemingly much misunderstood; the distinction between pianoforte playing and music; and the deep meaning of Beethoven's Sonatas, may be cited as amongst the most valuable portions of a book, to which indeed we must award unqualified praise. "The technical part," says the authoress in Chapter vi., "is in all arts long, hard, difficult to master, and must be taught only by those who know. I believe it is difficult to find artists to teach the young, but the public institutions will, I hope, in time, fill the void, and give us teachers who have also artistic value." We may perhaps be allowed to add to this observation a hope that these teachers of "artistic value" may produce pupils who faithfully reflect the high qualities of their masters.

The Organ Fournal. Nos. 7 and 8. By Dr. W. J. Westbrook. [W. J. Willcocks and Co.]

DR. WESTBROOK is a veteran in the ranks of those who provide organists with the wherewithal to vary their répertoire of original compositions for the noble instrument.

Only pedants object to transcriptions per se, the common sense view of the matter being that every arrangement should stand or fall on its own merits. Considered in this light the present pieces deserve favourable recognition, for they are not generally known in their original shape, while without exception their merits are considerable. would especially draw attention to a lovely air in the manner of a slow minuet from Haydn's forgotten "Orfeo" in No. 7, and in No. 8 an Andante rustico, by Dussek, from the Fantasia (Op. 76). It is scarcely necessary to state that in all cases the task of transcription has been carried out with taste and knowledge of effect.

Viens à moi. Pensée musicale. Pour Piano. Zephyrs de Mai. Caprice Fantastique. Pour Piano. Tyrolienne. Pour Piano.

Par Victor Delacour. [Edwin Ashdown.]

WERE the special characteristics of modern "drawingroom" works as varied as their titles, amateurs might select an interesting repertory of such compositions for performance before their friends. Unfortunately, however, the piece is usually written upon the plan of presenting an eight-bar phrase, with a second part-either in the dominant or relative minor-which is repeated with different accompaniments and a coda. Part-writing, even in the mildest form, is rarely attempted, the left hand being a servile attendant upon the right. Although we hope that the time is approaching when music will cease to be written down to unformed amateurs, we are bound to chronicle some of the most refined of the multitude of "fashionable" trifles which come before us, and amongst these may be placed the pieces by Victor Delacour, the style of whom is fairly represented in the three we have selected from a number of his contributions. The first on our list is thoroughly conventional in design; but the Caprice, "Zephyrs de Mai," is based upon a pleasing, light subject, and contains some good pianoforte passages. The "Tyrolienne" is a well-written piece of its kind, and will afford some useful practice. The change into the subdominant is a welcome relief from the monotony of the too prevailing key of C.

Pack Clouds away, Song. Words Heywood, 1607. Music by Jessie Batterill. Words by Thomas (Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.

THE composer of this song, although new to us, claims a right to be heard, even in the present over-productive age, for her setting of Heywood's well-known words is as melodious as it is unpretentious. Her opening symphony presents us with an effective sequence of sevenths leading gracefully into the voice part, the melody of which is appro priately harmonised and sympathetically accompanied throughout. The ballad will assuredly secure a good reception from those who admire simple vocal music.

Humtius in Muro. Part-Song for A.T.T.B.B. The Latin Version of "Humpty Dumpty." From the Nursery Rhymes of England. Written by J. O Halliwell Phillips. Hush-a-Bye. Part-Song.

Composed by C. A. Macirone. [J. B. Cramer and Co.]

ALL who welcome a classical version of the well-known legend of "Humpty Dumpty" will be pleased to possess themselves of this capital part-song, the musical merits of which we need not here enlarge upon. "Hush-a-Bye" is composed to the authorised nursery words, for soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto; and, treated throughout with Miss Macirone's skill and humour, so often before shown in her settings of nursery ditties, cannot fail to produce a marked effect upon an audience. Mr. Henry Leslie, who now seems to have brought back the feeling for delicate part-music, should include this composition in his programme for next season.

Trois Feuillets d'Album. Pour le Piano. Par Stephen · Heller. [Forsyth Brothers.]

As a writer of refined and poetical sketches for the pianoforte the composer of these three pieces has long been celebrated; and should the misfortune which has now overtaken him preclude the possibility of his adding be in strong request.

even one more to his works of this class, his name will long live in our memory. Each of the pieces before us has a definite character, and the last especially should become a favourite with all who can appreciate artistic and unpretentious music.

Surely. Song. Words by M. Mark Lemon. Music by A. H. Behrend. Till the breaking of the day. Song. Words by H. L. d'Arcy Jaxone. Music by Ciro Pinsuti.
[W. Morley and Co.]

THE list of vocalists on the title-page of Mr. Behrend's song who have sung the composition with "unbounded applause," and the fact of its being published in six keys. may be accepted as undoubted proofs of its popularity; but as popular songs are not always good ones, we have much pleasure in bearing testimony to its musical worth. Little, indeed, is attempted save the telling of a simple story in simple notes; but the composer has thoroughly well accomplished what he aimed at, and this is no mean praise in these pretentious times. The lengthening of the word "home" at the conclusion of each verse gives much pathos to the sentence. Signor Pinsuti's vocal compositions do not decrease in quality as they increase in quantity. "Till the breaking of the day" is as full of true poetical feeling as any song we can remember by this refined and graceful artist; and we confidently predict for it a wide acceptance. The lingering upon the dominant of F minor, before the double bar, and the unexpected change to A flat major, where the C becomes the third of the tonic harmony, is extremely beautiful, the placid accompaniment materially aiding the effect of the tranquil phrase to which the music is wedded. We cordially commend this composition, for its unforced eloquence, to all vocalists who do not devote themselves to the feeble conventional songs of the day.

Cavatina for Violin. By G. F. Vincent. Op. 25.
[W. J. Willcocks and Co.]

THIS piece might fairly be described as a piano and violin duet, as a considerable share of the interest is allotted to the former instrument, particularly in the episode in A flat which divides the first and second exposition of the principal theme, a refined and elegant melody in E flat. Although a little condensation would certainly be an improvement, the piece, as a whole, is very expressive and pleasing, and violinists of moderate acquirements will find it within their means.

Overture to Wagner's "Rienzi." Arranged for the Organ by A. F. Delmar. [Weekes and Co.]

This is No. 2 of "a series of Overtures and Selections from the standard operas arranged for the chamber organ." The term chamber organ is misleading here; it should be concert organ, the arrangements being evidently intended for recitals and not for church use. A few months ago we noticed Mr. Delmar's clever transcription of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, and Wagner's brilliant and grandiose prelude to his afterwards discarded opera has been dealt with in a like skilful manner, effect being gained without any great technical difficulty.

The Souls of the Righteous. Anthem. By William Rea. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS work (No. 294 of Novello's Octavo Anthems) is worthy of its composer, who enjoys a very high reputation, not only for his skill as an organist, but for his self-denying zeal in the cause of musical art in the North of England. Indeed, the beautiful verses from the Book of Wisdom could scarcely receive a more satisfactory illustration. The anthem opens with a dignified and expressive chorus, with which the succeeding passage for tenors and basses, "The hope of the ungodly," is in appropriate contrast. This is followed by a melodious and somewhat Mendelssohnian soprano solo, "But the righteous live for evermore," and the very vigorous and well developed chorus, "They shall receive a glorious kingdom," brings the composition to a highly effective conclusion. Alike as a funeral anthem and for ordinary use, Mr. Rea's anthem ought to Button. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THERE is naturally a stronger demand for simple and straightforward services than for pretentious and elaborate settings, and Mr. Button's version is worthy of acceptance by parish choirs, for it is well written as well as unassuming. It is, for the most part, in plain diatonic harmony, and in this style of writing the composer is most at home, as there is a certain effect of patchiness or a suggestion of inconsequence about the few excursions he makes into remote keys. The merits of the service, however, more than outweigh this slight defect.

Cavatina for Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Composed by E. H. Thorne. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. THORNE has here given us a refined, graceful, and melodious little piece, which violin players will, we are certain, thank us for calling attention to. The principal theme is well contrasted with the second subject, and the conversational passages with the pianoforte lift the com-position above the ordinary level of violin solos, with an accompaniment cut to the conventional pattern.

Te Deum Laudamus. For Festal Occasions. By C. J. Ridsdale. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS setting is inscribed to the Rev. J. R. Buchanan, Vicar of Herne, where it is said the Ambrosian Hymn was first sung in English. It is "festal" rather in length than in elaboration, for although the voices are frequently subdivided, the writing is for the most part homophonous, and only now and then does the accompaniment force itself into notice by its richness or independence. The style of the music is essentially broad and diatonic, and in places it recalls, perhaps designedly, the manner of the seventeenth century Church composers. In others it is modern, as, for example, at the words "We believe that Thou shalt come," where a dactyllic figure is repeated no less than twenty-five times with questionable effect. As a whole, Mr. Ridsdale's Te Deum is a composition of great merit, and proclaims him to be a musician of whom much may be expected.

Handel. By Eliza Clarke. [Cassell and Co.]

This little volume is one of a series, entitled "The World's Workers," and, if we may judge by its diction, is intended for juvenile readers, though it is not so stated on the title-page. It is less a complete biography than a character sketch of the great composer, a large proportion of its contents consisting of personal anecdotes, most, if not all, of which are known to musicians, and of which it may be said, "Se non e vero," &c. So far as regards the facts of Handel's life, it is fairly correct; but the author's knowledge of musical instruments appears to be limited, for she speaks of the serpent as "a brass instrument of exceedingly soft, rich tone," and declares that on a certain memorable occasion Handel seized a kettledrum (?) and threw it vigorously at the head of the conductor. It may also be noted that among the oratorios no mention is made of "Israel in Egypt." Having regard to its obvious purpose, however, the volume may be spoken of as a success.

Carols of Cradleland. By Leonhard Emil Bach.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Ir can no longer be said that the claims of musical babes and sucklings are neglected. Their requirements in literature have been for some time well provided for, and latterly music publishers have also turned their attention to the needs of infantine performers. The present volume, tastefully illustrated by Mr. E. F. Manning, and sumptuously printed, as well as handsomely bound, is excellently adapted as a gift, leaving out of consideration the question of the intrinsic value of its contents. An examination of the latter suggests the idea that the songs are intended to be sung to children rather than by them, and this is confirmed by the statement that they have already been sung in public by Madame Sterling. They are six in number, Mr. Horace Lennard having contributed the words, in which a touch of sly humour may be traced. It cannot be said that Herr Bach's music is infantine in the sense of being puerile. Nos. 2 and 5 are simple enough; but, speaking generally, the series reflects something of the to the present, have been raised on behalf of the monument

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G. By H. Elliot style of Schumann when he was in the mood to throw off charming trifles. No. 3, "Little blue eyes," is a gem, and worthy of association with verses of more definite

> The School and Home Song Book. Selected and arranged by P. Goodman. [James Duffy and Sons.]

> On glancing at this volume the first thing that arrests the attention is the admirably simple, yet complete, synopsis of the rudiments of music and the elements of harmony as far as the chord of the dominant seventh. This is the more noteworthy, as the title-page describes the book merely as a collection of songs for use in Irish schools. The ditties are mostly in two-part harmony, and the Irish division, numbering seventy-six out of 130, is by far the most satisfactory. In the English and Scottish songs are some unfortunate adaptations from the great masters, perhaps the worst of which is one of Beethoven's already much abused song "Creation's Hymn." Musicians who may use Mr. Goodman's little work for teaching purposes will, doubtless, confine their attention to the first half, which leaves absolutely nothing to be desired.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A MUSICAL Festival was held from the 24th to the 26th ult. at Rostock, Germany, under the direction of Dr. Hermann Kretzschmar. An incidental feature of the programme was the combined commemoration of the bi-centenaries of Bach and Handel, and of the ter-centenary of Heinrich Schütz, the "father of modern German music."

The experiment of combining Schubert's "Rosamunde" music with a performance of "As you like it" ("Was Ihr Wollt," in the German version), recently tried at the Magdeburg Stadt-Theater, is said to have been a very great success. The musical numbers had been distributed great success. The industral infinites and bent satisfactors as follows:—Act I.: Overture and Entracte, No. 3 (B flat major); Act II.: "Trinklied" (Hirtenchor), Ballet-music, No. 2 (G major); "Romanze" and Entracte, No. 2 (D major); Act III.: Entracte, No. 1 (B minor), as prelude to the act, and "Hirten-melodie"; Act IV., as prelude: Ballet-music, No. 1 (B minor).
Wagner's "Siegfried" is in active course of preparation at the Berlin Opera, where it will probably be performed for the first time at the end of this or the beginning of next The following artists will be engaged in the principal parts—viz., Siegfried, Herr Ernst; Brinnhilde, Frau von Voggenhuber; Mime, Herr Liebau; Alberich, Herr Krolop. The Conductor will be Herr Radecke.

Next year's Bayreuth performances have been definitely decided upon in accordance with the scheme already foreshadowed in these columns. There will be alternate re-presentations of "Parsifal" and "Tristan und Isolde," thirty-four to thirty-six in all; the former, as before, to be conducted by Herr Levi, the latter alternately by Herren Hans Richter and Felix Mottl, of Carlsruhe.

According to a new regulation, issued by the municipal authorities of Bonn, all private teachers of music in that town will, in future, have to apply for a license to enable them to continue their avocation, and to obtain which they will have to subject themselves to an examination respecting their competency as instructors in the art. The town of Bonn is setting an excellent example to the musical world generally by the adoption of this measure.

Herr Xaver Scharwenka's Conservatorium at Berlin has, according to the annual report just to hand, made very satisfactory progress during the short period of its existence. The institution now numbers 403 pupils, among whom are 113 foreigners, and the teaching body consists of twentynine professors. A new term will commence on the 5th inst.

The project of raising a monument at the town of Brunswick (where he had been for many years Capellmeister) to the late Franz Abt, meets with some well-grounded opposition in German musical quarters, where the claims to such a distinction on the part of the prolific composer of pleasing songlets are looked upon as, at least, not very urgent ones. Nevertheless, the Abt admirers will probably have their way, seeing that the subscriptions towards the carrying out of the scheme are said already to exceed those which, up to be erected to Weber at his native Eutin. named fact (if it be a fact) appears to be as incredible as it certainly is little creditable to the countrymen of the composer of "Der Freischütz."

Anton Rubinstein before finally withdrawing, as it has been his intention to do for some time past, from the public as a pianoforte player, intends, it is stated, to give a short series of Concerts in the different capitals of Europe. In these Concerts, it is added, the eminent pianist will present a representative programme of pianoforte literature, both ancient and modern, and the final Concert of the series will consist exclusively of the performer's own compositions. The receipts of these projected Concerts are to be devoted to benevolent purposes. Although rumours respecting Rubinstein's retirement as a public performer have obtained periodically for some years, there is reason to believe the above statement to be correct, and those who have not availed themselves of previous opportunities of hearing one of the most remarkable pianists which the present century has produced should not fail to do so when it recurs; probably during the coming season.

Franz Liszt will leave Weimar this month for his annual sojourn at Rome. The Maëstro has, it is stated, nearly completed his new Oratorio "Stanislaus," which will probably be performed during the coming winter.

For some time past there have been rumours afloat of the discovery, by one Herr Schradieck, of an American pine, a species of the spruce tree, the wood whereof, if used in the manufacture of violins, is said to render these instruments very similar in quality of tone to those made by a Guarneri or Stradivari. Indeed, it is said that the great Cremona masters did employ the wood of the spruce (which formerly grew in Tyrol) in the manufacture of their match-less instruments. However that may be, the matter is now being tested at Berlin, where some violins are being constructed of the wood in question, and which will be submitted to the judgment of experts. But let the verdict be known as soon as possible, if only to shorten the anxious suspense into which the possessors of old Cremonas are naturally thrown in the meantime, while the terrible Herr Schradieck threatens to reproduce exactly, at so much per gross, an instrument for which they have probably paid s)me hundreds of pounds!

A dramatised version of Heribert Rau's so-called artistnovel, entitled "Carl Maria von Weber," is shortly to be produced (so the Signale informs us) at one of the Berlin theatres. The author is Herr W. Busse, and the receipts of the performances are to go to the benefit of the Eutin Weber monument fund.

Herr Johann Strauss is shortly expected in Berlin, where he is to conduct jubilee performances of three of his Operettas, at the Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt'sche Theater viz., the three hundredth of "Der lustige Krieg," the fiftieth of "Eine Nacht in Venedig," and the four hundiedth of "Die Fledermaus."

Herr Robert Franz has resigned, on account of his failing health, his position as Musical Director of the University of Halle, a post which he has occupied for so many years.

The musical "Faust" literature has been increased, and, we trust, enriched by a new Opera of that title from the we trust, emicined by a new operator that the folial pen of Herr Heinrich Zöllner, musical director of the University of Dorpat. The libretto of the new work is said to follow as closely as possible the lines upon which Goethe's masterpiece (Part I.) is constructed, and its performance is being looked forward to with interest.

At the Annual Congress of German Zither-Societies, recently held at Dresden, there was an excellent attendance. At the Concert given in connection with the meeting, much interest was manifested by the audience in the performances, which included numbers bearing the names of Schubert and Schumann, and even of Brahms and announced to take place at the end of last month.

A Concert will be given on the 4th inst. at the Church of St. Nicholas, Leipzig, by the famous Berlin Domchor, under the direction of Herr von Herzberg. This, we believe will be the first time the choir has been heard in the central musical town of Germany.

The Stuttgart Hof-Theater has now to be added to the number of those operatic establishments where the orchestra has been lowered according to the Bayreuth model. The innovation is said to have effected a great improvement, from an acoustical point of view, at the theatre referred to.

The total number of pupils at the Dresden Conservatorium during the past academical year was 769, thirty-

Professor Ehrlich, the well-known Berlin musical savant, is said to have completed a comic opera in three acts, the libretto of which has been furnished him by Dr. Ziemssen. Among the principal works to be performed during the coming winter at the Gürzenich Hall of Cologne, under the direction of Professor Wüllner, are Berlioz's Requiem and Bach's Mass in B minor.

Herr S. de Lange has resigned his position as Conductor of the famous Cologne Männergesangverein, having accepted a similar post in the Hague.

Professor Joseph Joachim will start upon a Concert-tour in Southern Germany in the course of next month, and is due in the French capital in January next, in order to take part in some of M. Colonne's Châtelet Concerts.

A new opera, "Melusine," composed by Herr Ferdinand

Langer, of Mannheim, the libretto by Herr Ernst Pasqué, has been accepted for performance by several German operatic establishments.

Herr Adolf Mohr's opera "Loreley," first brought out during last season at the Breslau Stadt-Theater, will likewise be produced this winter at Düsseldorf and Mayence.

At the Imperial Opera of Vienna, Rubinstein's "Nero" was performed for the first time this season on August 30, before a full house, and has continued to attract since, owing, no doubt, partly to the excellent representation of the hero on the part of Herr Winkelmann, as well as to the magnificent way in which the work has been put on the magnineent way in which the work has been put on the stage. On the 4th inst. there will be a revival at the same establishment of Gluck's "Alceste," with Herr Scaria as Hercules, Herr Winkelmann as Admete, and Frau Materna as Alceste. On the 19th of next month, a new opera, "Marfa," by Johannes Hager, will be produced. Herr Franz von Suppé, the well-known composer of presenties accounted to the section of the section o operettas, is engaged upon a serious opera in five acts entitled "Die Corsin."

Herr Emerich Kastner, the well-known Wagnerian scholar, and late editor of the journal Parsifal, has just issued the first number of a new music journal published at Vienna, under the title of Kastner's Wiener Musikalische Zeitung, which, from its contents, promises well for the solidity and variety of its subject-matter in the future. There is room in the Austrian capital for the publication of a music journal of this description.

A commemorative tablet was affixed, on the 7th ult., to the house at Lomatzsch (Bohemia), where Robert Volk-mann first saw the light.

On the 19th ult. Massenet's Opera "Manon" was given with great success, for the first time, at the Bohemian National Theatre in Prague. The part of Manon was entrusted to Madame Minnie Hauk. The Direction of the same theatre has commissioned Dvorák to write an

The Paris Opéra Comique re-opened its doors on the 1st ult., with a performance of Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs," which was succeeded on the following nights by Léo Delibés's "Le Roi l'a dit" and Joncière's "Le Chevalier Jean." The first novelty at this theatre this season will be M. Widor's new opera, the title of which has not been quite decided upon, but will probably be "Les Patriotes, the libretto from the pen of M. use of by him in a new operatic work dealing with an episode in Slavonic history.

An interesting volume, entitled "Lettres d'un Mélo-mane," from the pen of M. Guillaume Cottran, and dealing with the state of music during the period of 1829 to 1847 at Naples, has just been published by the firm of Morano, of that town.

Under the title of "Harmonie et Melodie" a volume has scries of essays from the pen of M. Camille Saint-Saëns.

In accordance with a recent order of the Prefect of the Seine, those Symphonies which obtained the prize offered by the town of Paris during the years 1883, 1884, and 1885, are to receive a worthy public performance during next season. A committee, consisting of leading musicians of France, has been entrusted with the execution of this praiseworthy scheme.

At the Alfieri Theatre, of Turin, a new Opera from the Maëstro Paolo Maggi, entitled "Fornarina," is in course of preparation, and will shortly be produced.

Signor Lamperti has succeeded M. Strakosch in the direction of the Apollo Theatre, of Rome.

A new Opera, "Semiramide," by Signor Sangermano, is to be brought out this season at La Scala, Milan. Arrigo Boïto, the composer of "Mefistofele," is reported to be the author of the libretto.

At the Zurich Stadt-Theater, Herr Oscar Niemann, son of the famous Wagner-interpreter, Albert Niemann, has recently made his débût as Valentin in "Faust" and other baritone parts with very good success. He is a pupil of Signor Lamperti, of Milan.

At Jitomir (Russia), died last month, Jules de Zarembski, the gifted Polish pianist, whose name became more generally known when, during the Paris Exhibition of 1878, he gave a number of Recitals on M. Mangeot's newly invented pianofortes à double clavier renversé, and to which we referred in our notes at the time. M. Zarembski afterwards became the successor of Louis Brassin, at the Brussels Conservatoire, and died at the early age of thirtyfour, a victim of consumption.

Mdlle. Van Zandt, the young frima donna, has accepted an engagement this winter at Moscow, where she will appear in twelve Operatic and as many Concert performances, receiving for each the sum of 5,000 francs.

A new opera, "Harold," from the pen of the Bohemian composer, M. Eduard Napravnik, long resident in Russia, is being prepared for performance at the Marie Theatre of St. Petersburg, where the composer is the orchestral conductor. Napravnik is already known by several operatic

Verdi's "Aïda" was performed for the first time in Denmark last month, at the Copenhagen Hof-Theater, in connection with the betrothal festivities of Prince Waldemar with Princess Marie of Orleans.

The German Opera at Rotterdam celebrated the twentyfifth anniversary of its establishment last month with a festive performance.

The projected Organ Recitals, to be given by a number of eminent foreign organists in connection with the musical department of the present Antwerp Exhibition, have been abandoned; the musical arrangements generally being of a far less representative character than had been anticipated.

According to the statement of a Madrid music journal, no professional pianist has as yet become a victim of the prevailing cholera-epidemic in Spain. We must leave it to our medical contemporaries to furnish an explanation of this somewhat extraordinary phenomenon.

At Bucharest the season of opera has recommenced with répertoire consisting chiefly of "Lucia," "Traviata," "Marta," "Giroflé," and similar works, all of which are performed in the Roumanian language.

Telegraphic advices, which reached this country shortly before our going to press, report a sad disaster to have taken place at Stockholm in connection with the present visit to her native Sweden of Madame Christine Nilsson. It appears that, on the night of the 23rd ult., after a Concert, whereat she was the principal artist, the gifted and amiable lady, in fulfilment of a promise, sang from the balcony of the Grand Hôtel to an assembled multitude, which is estimated at some 30,000. As the people were about to disperse a crush occurred, when upwards of eighteen persons were killed and many more injured. Everyone will sympathise with Madame Nilsson, whose stay in her native country has been thus marred, and whose generous efforts to give pleasure to the many who would otherwise have had no opportunity of hearing her have ended in a calamity which, in its magnitude, is probably unique in the history of celebrated prime donne.

At Magdeburg died, on August 26, Professor A. G. Ritter, one of the most celebrated organ players and composer for his instrument in Germany. Ritter was appointed to the post of Organist at the Magdeburg Cathedral in 1847, and has occupied it to the last. A valuable, and indeed unique, "History of organ-playing, from the fourteenth to the eighteenth century," has likewise proceeded from his pen.

He died at the age of seventy-four.

The death is announced, on August 29, of Joseph Servais, the son of Adrien François Servais, the famous violoncellist, and successor of his father at the Brussels Conservatoire as a professor of that instrument. He was only thirty-five years of age.

At Berlin died, on the 13th ult., Friedrich Kiel, at the age of nearly sixty-four. We record the event more fully in our obituary column.

We have also to record the death last month, at Berlin, of K. H. Bitter, formerly a Minister of State in the Prussian service, and likewise a musical dilettante of no mean attainments, especially as regards the historical aspects of the art. He is the author of a very able "Life of Sebastian Bach, also of a work on Bach's two sons, Philipp Emanuel and Wilhelm Friedemann, and other musico-historical works; one (on Gluck and Wagner) having been but recently reviewed in this journal. Bitter was in the seventythird year of his life.

MUSICAL COMPETITION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-In connection with the recent contest at the Albert Hall, I trust you may be able to find space for a few general remarks upon the extension of the principle of competition to music, which, while a logical and an inevitable step, I can by no means consider to be an unmitigated boon. As a test of individual merit it is indispensable; but, when applied to the public performances of rival musical societies, it labours under certain defects which must be taken as a set-off to the spirit of emulation encouraged by such contests. In the first place, the very nature of these tournaments, and the fact that the public are able to express their appreciation at the efforts of the performers, is only calculated to enhance the dissatisfaction of defeated competitors when confidence in their own powers is supported by popular applause. A spirit of jealousy too is not infrequently engendered, which, to my knowledge, has been known to impair the social harmony of a provincial town, and there is a danger lest music should come to be looked on as a mere means of glorification rather than an end in itself. Musical tournaments are sometimes apt to be discredited from the circumstances of their organisation. For example, such a contest, on quite a large scale, for bands, soloists, and choirs, with handsome prizes, was instituted a few years back by a monster shop in the North of England as a vehicle for advertisement. It is only fair to state that thoroughly competent judges were retained, and some excellent performances resulted; but I hold that it is degrading to any art to convert it into a means of commercial advancement, and unfair to needy musicians thus to secure a greater sale for "I/II hats" or "8/6 trousers. Again, experience proves that a disinclination exists amongst many associations of established repute to avail themselves of the chances of distinction which such competitions afford. Such disinclination may be explained in different ways, but there can be little doubt that it exists. In a very thoughtful article in the Daily Telegraph it is condemned as prompted by causes incompatible with genuine enthusiasm for the art. With this opinion I can hardly concur, and would quote in contravention thereof the remark made by a distinguished and enthusiastic musician, himself the conductor of a well-known choir: "We have everything to lose, and nothing to gain, by entering for such a contest. Even if we were to win, we should add nothing to our present reputation, which is founded on the execution of a different sort of music from that selected for this competition."

With all respect for the able writer in the Daily Telegraph, I cannot share his belief in the immense value of such tournaments, or his conviction that their spread will be coincident with the spread of a national interest in music. As an initial stage I believe them to be distinctly useful, just in the same way that talent in other depart-As an initial stage I believe them to be distinctly ments is often elicited by prize competitions. One of the most able of our provincial journalists dates his rise into notice from the day when he won a handsome honorarium for an essay on a political subject. But it would be unreasonable to expect a man to devote himself to a career of competition, a career which cannot escape the charge of pothunting; and what is true of individuals is also true of associations. Competition should never be looked upon in any other light than in that of a means; and the wholesale introduction of the competitive system in art would, I firmly believe, have the same levelling effect upon the artistic intelligence that it undoubtedly has exercised in the sphere of scholastic acquirements. The competitive system has developed the mechanism of preparation known by the vulgar but expressive term of "cramming," a process not altogether unknown, I fear, to candidates for degrees and distinctions in music. Such a term would not, of course, be applicable to the training of choruses for public contests; but such training, if of frequent occurrence, would not be without its dangers. It would restrict the conductor in the choice of works to those prescribed by the organisers of such contests (precisely in the same way that schoolmasters are often determined in their choice of subjects, not by the capacities of their pupils, but by the requirements of the Oxford or Cambridge Local Examination Boards) and substitute for the true function of musical associations a craving for material distinctions and notoriety. Perhaps I have been unduly alarmist in the foregoing remarks, and the event will falsify my misgivings; but I have been haunted all along in my reflections upon this subject by a saying of Berlioz's to the effect that the most musical country is not that which possesses the greatest number of musicians, but which has given the most creative and original musicians to the world. We cannot make a country more musical by merely multiplying the number of musicians, unless their motive in following this career be a sincere love of art. With all that the writer in the Daily Telegraph has to say upon the value of co-operation and combination I am entirely in accord. It is only by the union of detached vocal and instrumental resources that an adequate performance of certain monumental works is possible outside the great musical centres, and I have nothing but praise for any system of organisation which has so admirable a consummation for its end and aim. But if the ensuing decade is destined to witness any considerable spread the competitive system in music, I trust that it may be jealously safeguarded from any of the dangers to which actual experience and the argument from analogy prove it to be liable.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

C. L. G.

METROPOLITAN LIEDERTAFEL, MELBOURNE.
TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES,"

SIR,—In a letter to you some four years back, this Society was brought under the notice of your readers, and I now wish to inform you that the one hundredth Concert was given-in the Town Hall, on June 29, before an audience filling the building, many persons having to stand the whole evening. The programme included the first and second parts of Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," with English words especially translated by Madame Carlotta Tasca (hon. member), the parts of Faust, Mefhistopheles, and Brander being taken by Messrs. Armes Beaumont, T. Bergin, and condemned as prompted by causes incompatible with S. Angus respectively. Herr Louis Pabst, pianist and genuine enthusiasm for the art. With this opinion I can composer, made his first appearance before an Australian headly concern and would queet in contravation therefore and interest and incomposers.

A noteworthy feature in connection with this (centenary) Concert was that every one of the hundred Concerts has been conducted by Mr. Julius Herz. Mr. Herz's health has, I am sorry to say, given way from overwork, and the Society has granted him six months' leave of absence on full pay.

Since the former letter the tariff of the Society has been doubled, the subscription having been raised to two guineas, and the extra tickets (sold to subscribers only) to 7s. 6d. for gentlemen and 5s. for ladies. There are about 700 subscribers, with a list of many waiting for admission.

and nearly 100 singing members-men only.

Within the past four years the Society has produced (substituting boys' for women's voices when required) Wagner's "Lohengrin," first and third acts; "Tannhäuser," third act; "Love feast of the Apostles" and Mendelssohn's "Œdipus"; and the first act of the "Huguenots" will shortly be placed in rehearsal. These works are, of course, in addition to a large number of the best available partongs.

The Society's Concerts are eagerly looked for, as they serve to introduce most of the leading artists, vocal and instrumental, who visit Melbourne. Eight Concerts are given—four for ladies and gentlemen in the Town Hall, and four for gentlemen (Smoking Concerts) in the Atheneum Hall. At the former large orchestras are almost invariably employed, and the following works, among many others, have been given, several for the first time here—viz., Mendelssohn—A minor (Scotch) Symphony, Italian Symphony (Op. 90), G minor Concerto (piano), and Concerto (flute); Beethoven—E flat Concerto (piano), Sinfonia Pastorale, F (No. 8) Symphony, D (No. 5) Symphony, C (No. 1), Symphony C minor (No. 5), Overture ("Fidelio"), and a portion of Ninth Symphony; Wagner—Grand Festival March, Overture to "Tannhäuser," Introduction to "Lohengrin" and L'Entr'acte, Charfreitzag Zauber; Weber—Concertstück (piano); H. Herz—Concerto (piano, chorus and orchestra); Hugo Ullrich—Symphony Triomphale (No. 9) and B minor (No. 6); Saint-Saëns—"Danse Maccabre"; Liszt—Concerto (piano); and Pratten—Concertstück (flute), &c.

We find, at this distance from the musical centres of the world, a great difficulty in keeping up a supply of suitable male-voice choruses (two tenors and two basses), and will very willingly receive samples of such from any source. Latterly much valuable help has been rendered to us by Mr. Arthur Reed, secretary of Apollo Glee Club of Boston, U.S., Messrs. Novello and Co., Messrs. Chappell and Co., and Messrs. Augener and Co., for which we return our heartiest thanks.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Thos. J. Connor, Hon. Sec.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Mr. David Baptie, in his Musical Biography, informs us that Thomas Este (or Est), the music typographer and publisher, was born about 1550 and died about 1625; that Michael Este, the madrigalian composer (supposed to have been a son of the preceding), was born about 1575 and died 1638 (according to Mr. Rockstro).

Now, in a fine copy of the treatise on "The Art of Divine Meditation," by Joseph Hall, D.D., "printed at London by Humphrey Lownes for Samuel Macham, 1614," and which is before me whilst writing, the following passage occurs in Cap. iii., "Concerning Meditation Extemporall" (defined to be that occasioned by outward occurrences offered to the mind, as distinguished from formal or "deliberate" meditation) :-

"Thus that learned and heauenly soule of our late Estye, when wee sate together and heard a sweete comfort of Musicke, seemed upon this occasion carried vp for the time beforehand to the place of his rest, saying, not without some passion, What Musicke may we thinke there is in heauen?"

It seems probable that the passage quoted refers to one or other of the above celebrities. Can any of your contributors or readers say to which? If to either, then one of the death dates given in the Musical Biography must be

The above extract would appear to be conclusive as to the proper pronunciation of the name.

MUSICAL DEGREES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I am sorry that those who uphold the value of Musical Degrees should not have found a better advocate than "Mus. Bac. (Cantab.)," whose effusion appears in your September issue. I was afraid that someone would jump to the conclusion that I was a disappointed aspirant for a University degree, and therefore I added a postcript to my last letter. "Mus. Bac. (Cantab.)," however, entirely ignores it in order to bring in a little mild sarcasm !

With regard to his fifth sentence I beg to draw his attention to the following, which I find in Grove's Dictionary, Vol. II., page 624, sub voce-"Oxford: The principal change introduced in the new regulations, which were passed in 1878, is the provision requiring a candidate for a degree in music, to have passed a mixed literary examination recognised by the University. It was imagined, when this test was added to the Musical Examination, that it would add to the value of Musical Degrees; its real effect has been to sever the connection between the University and the musical world, which, through the apathy and mismanagement of the University in past times, had become a very slight one, but was beginning to gain strength under the sensible rules in operation before The number of persons taking the Bachelor's 1878. Degree had risen from three in 1866 to twenty-one in 1878. Immediately after the passing of the new statute it fell to twelve in 1879, although the operation of the new statute did not affect persons who had passed the First Examination before 1878. In 1877, when the last Examination was held under the old statutes-i.e., in independence of any literary test—the number of persons passing the First Examination was fifty-three. In 1878, when the literary test was added, it fell to two. In 1879 it was three, and in 1880 the same.

Further on, in the same article, I am glad to find the following :-

"A Commission, under the chairmanship of Lord Selborne, is at present dealing with the affairs of the University of Oxford, and has received evidence on the state of the musical as well as of other studies."

"Mus. Bac. (Cantab.)" refutes none of my arguments, and the first half of the second paragraph is lame in the last degree.

In conclusion, let me remind "Mus. Bac. (Cantab.)" that the absence of those magic syllables "Mus. Bac." and " Mus. Doc." from a man's name is no more a proof of his inability to qualify for such degrees (e.g., the four gentlemen whose names I mentioned in my last letter) than the presence of them is a guarantee that their possessor is a musician, that is, in the real sense of the word. Yours faithfully, EXAM.

EDWARD HEESOM'S VIOLINS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Your correspondent, Mr. Colchester, will find the above name in Hart's "The Violin" (London: Dulau & Co., above name in Flatts. The Violin (London: Dutal & Col. 1875), p. 193. It is also given in the Index of Fleming's "Old Violins" (London: L. Upcott Gill, 1883), p. 319, and in Sandy's and Forster's "History of the Violin" (London: John Russell Smith, 1864). It does not appear in Davidson's "The Violin" (London: F. Pitman, 1871); Otto, Fétis, and Grove's Dictionaries are also silent on the JAS. MACKEY.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ABERDARE.—Among the local prize-winners at the National Eisteddfod was Mr. J. Henry Roberts, Mus. Bac. (Pencerdd Gwynedd), of Carnarvon, who took the first prize (£8 8s.), for a madrigal, the first prize (£5 8s.) for a tenor song, as well as the first prize out of twentyone compositions (£ 10 10s.) for the best "Festival Anthem." All Mr.
Roberts's compositions, in addition to being pronounced the best, were highly praised, and stated by the various judges to be of much merit.
We believe that it is an unprecedented occurrence for one individual to gain three prizes for musical compositions at the same Eisteddiod.

BOURTON, BERES.—On Tuesday the 15th ult. an Organ Recital was given in St. James's Church, by Mr. George Whitehead, Organist of the Parish Church, Swindon. The programme, which was well rendered, was selected from the works of Merandi, Batiste, Chopin, Haydn, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, Handel, &c.

CHARD.—After Choral Evensong on the 11th ult. the Choir of the Parish Church gave an excellent rendering of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, which was thoroughly appreciated by a large congregation. The whole of the solo parts were entrusted to Master Frank Derrick, whose clear voice of extensive compass and perfect intonation was descryedly admired. Mr. W. E. Ellen, A.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster, presided at the organ.

DARLINGTON.—On Sunday afternoon, the 13th ult., a Service of Song, entitled "Christian Husbandry," was performed at Greenbank Chapel, by the members of the Chapel Choir, assisted by a band of twenty instrumentalists. The work, which is the joint production of the Rev. C. T. Coulbeck (Pastor), and Mr. W. Heslop (Choirmaster), was highly appreciated. Mr. H. Hildrop presided at the harmonium, and Mr. C. Stephenson, A.C.O., at the pianoforte. Mr. Heslop conducted, and Rev. C. T. Coulbeck gave the connective readings.

ELGIN.—An Organ Recital was given in the South Free Church on the 15th ult. by Mr. Collyer, which was highly appreciated. The programme comprised selections from the works of Bach, Pinsut, Schubert, Beethoven, Rossini, and Sterndale Bennett. The vocalists were Miss Falconer and Mr. R. Mackay. The organ has recently received some additions, and the effect of the new stops was well brought out in the performance of the various pieces.

IPIELD, CRAWLEY, SUSSEX.—An Organ Recital was given on Tuesday, the 8th ult., at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, by Mr. W. Hut, Organist of Winchester College. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Chipp, Bach, Gounod, Schubert, Rossini, H. Smart, Batiste, and Costa. The Recital was attended by a large number of the parishioners and neighbouring gentry, who thoroughly appreciated the capabilities of the instrument, and Mr. Hutt's skifful manipulation. The organ, which has a fine tone, was recently erected by Messrs W. Beales and Co., of Croydon.

Leeds.—The Sunday Performances of Sacred Music, which have been given in the open sir in, and about Leeds, during the summer, deserve more than a passing notice, not only on account of their intrinsic musical merits, but also for their benevolent pecuniary object, all profits being generally devoted to the Leeds Medical Charities. The music performed is always selected from the best composers. The band comprises about sixty instruments, chiefly strings, and the choir numbers nearly four hundred. Mr. J. Heywood is the Conductor.

LEYTON.—On Saturday the 12th ult. Mr. H. C. Tonking gave an Organ Recital in St. Mary's Church. The instrument has been rebuilt and enlarged by Bishop and Son. Mr. Tonking's programme included works by Mendelssohn, Chipp, Smart, J. E. German, and MILFORD HAVEN.—An Evening Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, on Monday, August 24, by Miss Lilian Thomas, R.A.M., assisted by Miss Kaite Thomas, Mr. C. Videon Harding, Mr. James Thomas, Miss A. T. Jones (harp), and Mr. Johnson (bandmaster). The Concert was in aid of the Masonic Hall Building Fund, and was a great success both musically and financially.

NEWGASTLE—An excellent plan has been inaugurated in St. Thomas's Church of providing sacred music on Sundays for those who are fond of listening to the masterpieces of great composers. The first Recital was given after the evening service, on the 13th ult, by Mr. J. Preston. There was a large congregation. The movement, which has the hearty support of the Vicar of St. Thomas's (the Rev. Marsden Gibson), is likely to be successful, and the music will be continued after each Sunday evening service.

Newfoundlean.—On Tuesday the 1st ult, the new choir and transerts of the Cathedral of St. John the Baptist were consecrated by the Bishop of Newfoundland, assisted by the Bishop of Halifax, Nova Scotia, and ninety-two of the clergy of Newfoundland. The clergy and choir assembled in the Sunday Schoolroom, opposite the cathedral, and marched across the road to the west door of the church, and thence up the middle of the nave, singing "The Church's one foundation," to "Aurelia"; three Pasilms, the 24th, 12st, and 12and, were sung, the Bishop of Newfoundland singing the odd verses alone, and the even verses by all the rest of the procession which followed the bishops through the north choir aisle, across in front of the altar, and down the south aisle, returning to the former position under the tower. Here all knelt, and the Litany was sung, the Rev. H. Dunfield being Precentor. Then followed a hymn during which the choir and clergy took their places in the new choir stalls. The Communion Service followed, the Anthem, "Hear the voice and prayer "(Hopkins), being sung as an introit. The recessional was "Hark the sound of holy voices," to tune "Deerhurst." All the music was exceedingly well rendered. In the evening, at 7,30, there was full choral Evenson, with processional and recessional. The Precess and Responses were Helmore's arrangement of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the control of the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper Psalms from the Standard Comment of Tallis, and the Cantides and Proper of Tallis, which has been now located in the south choir aisle.

NORTHAMPTON.—At Melbourne Pleasure Gardens, on the 24th ult., a competition of brass bands was held before a large audience. The judge was Mr. C. Godfrey, Bandmaster Reyal Horse Guards (Blue), but owing to the length of the programme the Cornet Contest had to be judged by Mr. Owen, of Stalybridge. PRESTON.—On Saturday evening, the 12th ult., Mr. E. Holland, bandmaster of the Northamptonshire Regiment, commenced another series of his popular Concerts in the Public Hall. The solo vocalists were Madame Emilie Clarke, Miss Dews, ann Mr. S. Wylde, all of whom were thoroughly appreciated. The programme included the Overtures to Taucred's and William Tell, well played by the band, and the new vocal waltz, "Fairie Voices," sung by a number of boys. Mr. Holland conducted, and Mr. Lovett accompanied. The hall was retouched.

SALPORD.—A meeting was held on Tuesday evening, August 25, at the Waverley Hotel, for the purpose of promoting the formation of a musical society for that locality. Mr. Charles Prest presided. Mr. John Bannister, the convener of the meeting, suggested that the society should be called the Waverley Musical Club, and that the members should not be limited to persons who could sing or play, but "embrace all who love music for music's sake." A committee was a some content of the country of the country of the regulation of the club, and abount the same to a future meeting.

Sandown.—An amateur Concert, in aid of St. John's Organ Fund, was given in the Town Hall, on Monday evening, the 7th ult, which proved highly successful. Several pieces were well rendered by the band, and the volo vocalists were thoroughly efficient. Miss Drabble WELLINGTON, N.Z.—Mendelssohn's St. Paul was produced in Wellington for the first time in its entirety in St. Paul's Cathedral Church, on July 29, under the direction of Mr. Robert Parker. The chorus comprised nearly too voices, and the solos were taken by competent amateurs. There was a very efficient orchestra, and Mr. Harland, of Wesley Church, presided with ability at the organ, which is a fine instrument by Lewis. The effect of some of the choral numbers, especially "Rise up, arise," and "O great is the depth," was exceedingly good, and made a marked impression on the large congregation. A week later Elijah was given in the Concert Hall of the New Zealand Industrial Exhibition, as the first of a series of choral works which are to be produced at short intervals during the time the Exhibition is open. A special festival chorus, consisting of the various about 200 voices. An organ has also been erected, and all the available orchestral players, including the Wellington Orchestral Society, have been engaged. The performance of Elijah was a marked success, Mr. R. Parker conducted, and Mr. Neville Barnett, F. C.O., of Auckland, was organist for the occasion. Other works to be produced in like manner, and under the alternate conductorship of Mr. Parker and Doty, Jubilse Contats, and the Ancent Mariner. Organ Recitals and Orchestral Concerts also form part of the musical arrangements for the Exhibition.

Whitnsy.—An excellent Ballad Concert was given in St. Hilda's Hall on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., by Miss Louie Harper, R.A.M., Mrs. Capsay, Mr. Hart, Mr. Burgin, and Miss Ada Powell. Miss Harper was highly successful, her rendering of "Should he upbraid" calling forth the demonstrative approval of the audience. Mrs. Capsay sang with much finish, and Mr. Burgin's singing of "The Village Blacksmith" was greatly admired. Miss Powell's pianoforte playing was a decided feature in the Concert.—Organ Rectitals were given in St. Michael's Church, on the 7th and 53th ult., Mr. W. S. Clarke, t'e Organist of the Church, assisted by visitors to the town. Selections from the works of J. S. Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Gade, Sterndale Bennett, Goucod, and Freyer were performed.

WORTHING.—A grand Military Concert was given on Wednesday evening, August 26, at the new Assembly Rooms, by the band of the Black Watch, by the kind permission of Colonel H. D. O. I MPORTANT NOTICE.—Mr. BLENNER-HASSET begs to inform his numerous Pupils, Students, and the Profession that in view of the many great improvements in Organs and their construction that have come under his notice at the Inventions Exhibition—notably the Tubular Presumation—he has made arrangements for one of three Manuals and Pedals of the very learest system to Messre, Hunter and Son, of Clapham, to be creted at his studio in Vernon Street, thus giving his patrons the opportunity of prosecuting their studies on what will be the most modern instrument of the period. The console will be placed in the original "Organ Room," whilst the organ proper will be in an adjoining chamber, thus affording an opportunity of the performer hearing what he is doing.

This will necessitate removal of that now in his studio, which secured for itself a reputation of being "unique." It was designed by George Broadman and erected by Hunter, with suggestions from the late George Cooper and R. Limpus, in 1871.

It is for sale; any congregation, company, or private individual who wishes to secure a genuine instrument, which, when re-erected, will be a good as new, together with the automate blowing arrangement, will a good as new, together with the automate blowing arrangement, will exceed the removal, re-erection, and with the substance, as an inclusive price.

The change of unstrument will take place about the end of October, when it is expected the Studio will be closed for a few days only.

Further particulars as to price, specification, dimensions, &c., can be obtained, and it can be inspected any day between 7 a.m. and It p.m., at the Studios, Ixa, Vernon Street, King's Cross Road, Pentonville, close to Metropolitan (King's Cross) Station. MPORTANT NOTICE.-Mr. BLENNER-

The ORCHESTRA of November 1, 1884, says:—
"No matter what state of proficiency a violinist may be in, he will largely benefit by the adoption of the 'Spohr Holder.'"

The MUSICAL STANDARD of November 1, 1884, says:—
"Any violinist who adopts the 'Spohr Holder' will soon discover that he has increased command over the instrument, and can descend from the higher to the lower position with much greater dexterity and certainty than was possible without it."

"It must be a great help and comfort to the player in improving the position of the violin under the chin, and giving him more freedom in shifting."

BERTHOLD TOURS, Esq., writes:—
"I consider it a most important and valuable help to violin players, and shall take every opportunity to recommend it."

Sir GEORGE ELVEY writes:—
"I would strongly advise all violinists to use the 'Spohr Adjustable Chin-holder,' from which they, like myself, will derive every possible advantage and comfort."

"CONCERT" & "PROFESSOR" VIOLINS.

MESSES. RIVIERE and HAWKES beg to inform Professors of the Violin, and Players generally, that they have made an arrangement with one of the best French Violin Makers to manufacture for them, specially, two NEW STYLES of Violin, to be named as above. Messes. RIVIERE and HAWKES believe that they are supplying a long-felt want in introducing these Instruments to the Musical Public, for, up to the present, it has been almost impossible to buy a really good and carefully made Instrument suitable for Orchestral and Solo Playing at a moderate price; those in the market being mostly cheap French or German copies, roughly made, and of no real value. The Instruments we now bring forward are carefully made by experienced workmen, some of whom have gained their knowledge in the workshop of the celebrated maker J. B. Vulllaume. This will at once establish the fact that these Instruments are worthy of attention. They are carefully made on the lines of the great Italian makers, and there is no doubt that they will increase in value if care and attention is best owed on them. In appearance they are quite new, and remarkably handsome, a new oil varnish, which the maker has invented, being exclusively used on these Instruments.

THE SPECTRE'S BRIDE

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

The English Version by the Rev. J. TROUTBECK, D.D., from the Poem by K. J. Erben

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK

Paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 5s.
Vocal parts, 1s. 6d. each.

"THE TIMES.

"The difficult subject selected, Herr Dvorák has attacked with the conscientiousness of a true artist. He accepts all the consequences of insigruesome tale. Character is his first object, beauty a secondary consideration; for all the incidents of the spectral night march he mideavours to find musical equivalents, not avoiding even those effects of bold realism where the terrible borders on the comic. The bells of the midnight chime and of the funeral knell resound in his orchestra, and when the cock crows in the morning we hear his voice as plain as mossible in the flute and obsec. . . . His instrumentation more especially is full of the most startling surprises, which defy description. . Chitusiastic suppliause at the end of the performance was with such a work and such a rendering a foregone conclusion."

work and such a rendering a foregone conclusion."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Autonin Dvorák is now more destined than ever to be the composer who combines in himself the highest qualities of his art. What his tymphonies and his 'Stabat Mater' proclaimed, 'The Spectre's Bride' illimms and proves beyond possibility of cavil. I remember saying of the 'Stabat Mater' that it was abolutely original and absolutely teat. Now we have another composition of the same character to demonstrate that the first was no "fluke," and that the qualities named are really an outcome from the absolute originality and greatness of the author. It is to the honour of England that she so readily appresisted the musical value of Dvorák, and treated him with a distinction of conceded elsewhere. The Bohemian master, let us hope, will now make England his second country, to his own not less than to her divantage. .. As the estory went on, and the grasp of the power music tightened, something like excitement began to pervade that. It his increased moment by moment, till every number we dollowed by oud applause, which reached a tremendous climax. At the end Heovrák had again and again to appear amid a tempest of cheers, the assural expression of genuine feeling.'

Matural expression of genuine feeling."

STANDARD.

"This evening the production of Herr Dvorák's Cantata ' The Spectre's Bride' created quite a sensation, moving the Festival sudience to a stronger declaration of approval than had yet been vinced. Never was appliance more fairly earned by the executants, and never did a composer win a metal mental product the stands upon a level with Widness as a writer of unearthly music, and reveals also a certain individual character in method, design, and reatment, which place is. Enthusians such as was bestowed upon the composer, who conducted, received a greeting at the close that all still ring in his ears when he returns home to Prague. He was wice recalled by the acclamations."

MORNING POST

"The Cantata is intensely dramatic in form, and its treatment narks the strong individuality of the Bohemian musician. The themes are as unconventional as can be imagined, and the musical formulation is quite out of the ordinary groove."

"Dvorák's music is powerfully dramatic, there is no lack of melody in the vocal parts, and the instrumental and choral writing is as fine in its way as are the same departments in the composer's magnificent "Stabat Mater.' . . . The Success of 'The Spectre's Bride' rivalled that of any other novelty hitherto given."

SUNDAY TIMES

"As soon as the audience began to get interested applause came frequently, and at the end their enthusiasm knew no brunds. Cheers barst forth again and again, and the triumph of the composer-conductor was such as he will not readily forget. In a word, 'The Spectre's Bride' met with a great and unalloyed success."

"It may be briefly recapitulated that the work consists of four parts —a short prologue, a Requiem Mass, the 'Last Judgment,' and the 'Celestial Jerusalem.' In the prologue, which is sustained by the chorus and baritone solo, the keynote, or rather one of the keynotes of the conception, that of Death, is struck in a Leitmoiv consisting in its original shape of a descending sequence of three major seconds from C to G flat), and occurring to the words 'Horney's chiefled

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The new Oratorio is technically and æsthetically a success, though, perhaps, more so in the latter sease than in the former. It cannot be heard without emotion; or without a sense, at the end, that the spirit of the hearer has been raised to higher than earthly things, while is artistic imagination has been excited and his bodily sense gratified. These results I take as assured signs that the composer's mark has been fully hit... 'Mors et Vita' impresses—I was about to write awes."

DAILY NEWS.

"As in 'The Redemption,' so in 'Mors et Vita,' orchestral colouring is a pervading and important feature throughout; the recurrence of the representative themes already specified giving a unity to the latter work. Special effects are produced by the six trumpets, six horns, six harps, and other orchestral combinations. The instrumentation in 'Mors et Vita' is in many cases similar to that of 'The Redemption,' and other works of the composer. This, however, does not imply mannerism, but merely such distinctive individuality of siyle as is to be found in all masters and authors who have risen above the common herd of mere imitators. This M. Gound assuredly has done, not only in operas, but potably in his two great Oratorios, of which 'Mors et Vita' is the later and grander example."

"Mors et Vita' is worthy of M. Gounod at his very best. . . . In any estimate of Gounod's finer works henceforward made, 'Mors et Vita' may be mentioned in the same breath with 'The Redemption,' the 'Messe Solennelle,' 'Faust,' and 'Mireille.' . . Of the eventual popularity of the work I have no doubt—indeed, it is quite likely to be a couple of years hence, a greater favourite than 'The Redemption.'"

"The breadth, grandeur, and power of many parts of 'Mors et Vita' are undeniable. The Introduction, the 'Tuba mirum,' and the 'Sanctus' are equal to any sacred music that Gounod has written; while many movements are charming in pathos and beauty. The 'Felix culpa' in the Requiem, the lovely phrase at 'Qui Mariam absolvisti,' the solo and chorus in the second part, 'Beatt qui lawar stolas suus,' and the 'Jerusalem Cœlestis' in the third, are in every respect worthy of the composer of 'Faust.' In sustained melodic interest the new Oratorio is distinctly superior to 'The Redemption.'"

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"In respect of melody the new work is far richer than 'The Redemption.' There is very little recitative, and a positive wealth of delicious tune. As abstract music it is therefore more attractive than the earlier Oratorio, popular as that has become."

SLEEPING BEAUTY

FRANCIS HUEFFER

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Paper Cover, 2s. 6d.; Paper Boards, 3s.; Cloth gilt, 4s.

THE TIMES.

"It would lead too far to follow the composer into all the details of his thoughful and carefully developed work. Some of the most striking and successful points should, however, be specified. Prominent among these is the prelude to the first scene of the Cautata, with which a tenor song is intervoven. The structure of his piece betrays the accomplished workman, the Aliggro visual being especially remark with them as in a current of impassioned melody. . . The work was received with vociferous applause, and there is every reason to think that its success will be a permanent one." think that its success will be a permanent one.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Unquestionably, a good story is here, and well set out for musical treatment. In these respects the composer could hardly have been served better, and Mr. Cowen may consider himself fortunate. . . . No one acquainted in ever so slight a degree with the distinctive talent of Mr. Cowen can be surprised to hear that he has treated the subject of 'Sleeping Beauty' with great success. The composer of the 'Language of the Flowers' is master of a dainty and delicate art peculiarly fitted for such incidents as those above set forth. It enables him, by slight and graceful touches, to make his music serve every picturesque and suggestive purpose. . . The orchestration is never involved and confusing, while its colouring often suggests rather the French than the modern German school."

STANDARD.

"This evening the first novelty of the Festival was presented in Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata 'Sleeping Beauty' given with the most emphatic success under the bâton of the componer, who herein has followed up a notable list of successes with a work so fresh, ingenuous, and sparkling that it is likely to add the crowning laurel to his reputation. . . 'Sleeping Beauty' contains all the elements of a permanent popularity, and it will assuredly go the rounds of the choral societies without loss of time. A more emphatic triumph has seldom, if ever, greeted the composition of a native musician. Mr. Cowen was not only vociferously cheered by the audience, choir, and orchestra, but was summoned back to the platform amid a renewed outburst of applause. The Cantata is a valuable addition to the library of English music."

DAILY NEWS.

"The Cantata was enthusiastically received throughout, several of the numbers having been greatly applauded, especially the orchestral interlude suggestive of 'Maidenhood and Dreams of Love'; the opening chorus of the first scene; the Prince's scena 'Light, light at last', and the final duet for the Prince and the Princess. The composer, who conducted the performance, was loudly cheered at its close. Mr. Cowen's Cantata is a work of exceptional merit, and will no doubt soon receive repetition in many quarters."

DAILY CHRONICLE

DALLY CHRONICLE.

"Every page of the score is instinct with grace and refinement, whilst in the vocal portions—choral or solo—there is not a bar that is ungrateful to the singer. Mr. Cowen's style is popular—better still, it is agreeable and thoroughly English—and he acts wisely in adhering to it. I have no hestation in saying that Mr. Cowen has written nothing more melodic, nothing more elegant, and nothing more sustained in its musical interest than his delicate setting of the fascinating fairy tale which formed the chief item of the Concert to-night. . . . He possesses the priceless gift of melody—not the melody that comes by the broad-flowing tunefulness that seems to gather strength as it progresses."

ATHENÆUM,

"The composer has an apparently exhaustless fund of graceful melody. He has written nothing more charming and refined than the opening chorus of fays in the present work, 'Draw the thread, and weave the wood,' or the orchestral interlude descriptive of maidenhood, which may compare with the best parts of his 'Language of the Flowers.' His instrumentation is delicate, varied, and full of fancy, adding not a little to the effect of the whole work. We have no hesitation whatever in predicting for 'Sleeping Beauty' a wide and deserved coopularity." deserved popularity

THE

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY FREDERIC E. WEATHERLY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

C. HARFORD LLOYD.

Paper Cover, 18.

THE TIMES.

"There are but two stanzas. The first has for its burden the co 'Balder the beautiful is dead-is dead!'

The second begins-'Lift up your hearts, no more in sorrow weep. He is not dead; Balder doth only sleep.'

He is not dead; Baider doth only sleep.

The contrast thus indicated immediately suggests the transition for tearful to joyful measures, from minor to major keys, and of that as gestion Mr. Lloyd has skilfully availed himself. His music is the work of a competent and gifted composer. It is melodious and well wrist for the voices, and absolute freedom from pretentiousness gives as tional charm to it. The first part consists of a Poos adags in if mis The chorus repeats, in whispering piano, the words 'Baider the betiful is dead,' and from this dark-coloured groundwork rises the svoice with a striking phrase resembling nothing so much as a plonged sigh. On these lines the music proceeds till the words 'Lett hills sigh' give rise to a more animated theme, taken up by the chovices in succession. The hope of Spring—for Baider is nothing be symbolisation of reviving nature—occurs in a short orchestral intude, where the key changes, and the violoncello and horn announce new melody. There is some very brilliant writing in the second port of the work, and the climax is reached in a hymn-like Allegro massis of great power."

"Mr. Lloyd has dealt with the twofold aspect of this theme ir manner perfectly homogeneous, yet in each case distinctive. I style may be described as a mixture of the classical and the romani tis classicians being that of Mendelsohn, and its romanticism that Schumann. . . . The 'Song of Balder' is a work of taste and refinent, charged with expression, now tender, now forcible, but alwa apt and full of the element of beauty, without which there can be work of art worthy to be so called. It opens powerfully with a lame for sopping and the story of the state of the story of the state of the story of the sto be requisite to add that the little Cantata is a worthy addition English music."

DAILY NEWS.

"The text for Mr. Lloyd's music has been supplied by Mr. F. Westherly, who has furnished two suggestive verses, which the exposer has set in a very impressive style, some representative the being used in reiteration with good effect. The music is through well written, alike for the solo voice, the chorus, and the orchestrat.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Mr. Lloyd writes as one who is sure of his ground. His music not abstruse, and exhibits no vain striving after sensational effects of the succeeds in making his meaning plain, and, to accomplish this goes the straightest way to work. Two or three fluent melodies etcheral portions abound in spirit, the instrumentation is exceeding vigorous. The climax is well built up; indeed, it is here that the surposer has judiciously put forth his greatest strength. In the fluence of the piece the soloist and the chorus bewail the loss Balder in pathetic strains. Then come some orchestral passes effectively bridging the guil between graf and joy. In bold, sweep phrases the soloist bids sorrow cease as Balder simply aleeps. Tonfirmatory choral response is appropriately dignified, and to transcendent of the succeeds an elaborate finale, in which the soprano soloist revision beautiful is here!"

SUNDAY TIMES.

"Mr. C. Harford Lloyd's 'Song of Balder,' the second novelty the week, proved to be a clever and effectively written compassion marked by the musicianly skill and taste that invariably characteri Mr. Lloyd's work."

CAROLS FOR USE IN CHURCH DURING CHRISTMAS AND EPIPHANY

The Music Edited by HERBERT STEPHEN IRONS, late Organist of Southwell Minster.

With an Introduction by S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Rector of Lew-Trenchard, Author of "The Lives of the Saints." &c.

'n this Work there are Carols for Christmas Eve, Christmas Day, St. Stephen, St. John, Holy Innocents, New Year's Eve, New Year's Day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Sundays after Epiphany, Conversion of St. Paul, Purification of B.V.M.

The Traditional Carols are from different Counties and Countries—the Modern by well-known Authors.

"The Epiphany Carols are a noticeable feature in the book, and tive it a special value. Mr. Chope has done a real service by the ublication of this book." "Guarquian.

"By far the best and most copious collection of Carols. We arnestly recommend it."—Literary Churchman.

"We hall the appearance of this work with the highest satisfaction, and think that Mr. Chope has laid all lovers of Carols—and indeed we nay say all good Christians—under a lasting debt of gratitude by this dimitable collection of Carols."—The Choir.

"We welcome with great pleasure Mr. Chope's Carols. The music is most carefully edited by Mr. Herbert Stephen Irons, and there is a learned and interesting historical essay by Mr Baring-Gould. This book should be found at all Christmas choir festivals. Well adapted for the Church Service."—Saturday Review.

"The book might well take the place, during Christmas and Epiphany-tides, of the Hymnal ordinarily in use in any Church."—Church Times.

Applications for Grants of Carols, Music, or Words should be sent to Rev. R. R. Chope, Vicarage, 117, Queen's Gate, South Kensingon, S.W., and should contain a stamped and addressed envelope for reply. A liberal reduction is allowed to the Clergy, Organists, and School-masters on introducing the book.

Foreign orders should be sent early, with directions as to conveyance, agents, &c.

- "Carol singing in church is becoming every year more popular."—Guardian, December 27, 1883.
- * Epiphany Carols were sung on Sunday in many churches in London, where carol singing is rapidly becoming very popular."—Morning off, January 8, 1884. N.B.—There are six Sundays after Epiphany in the coming year, 1886.

"The Epiphany Carols are much liked."—Malcolm MacColl, St. Mark's, Fersey.

"Your Carols will, I hope, become familiar and dear to many who in fiter life may be in a position to extend their appreciation and teaching."—C. E. COOPER, The College, Hurstpierpoint.

"I congratulate you on so excellent a compilation. I hope it may avea wide circulation."—LIONEL DAWSON-DAMER, Canford Vicarage. "I am delighted with the book."-W. D. V. DUNCOMBE, The Colege, Hereford.

"For the third time in twelve years I am introducing your excellent larols into a country parish."—J. S. Hodson, D.D., Sanderstead sectory.

"They were taken up with heartiness, and were a source of delight and pleasure to the congregation, many of whom are old Englishmen, the remember singing them."—CHARLES W. HOLLANDS, Bonne Bay larsonage, Newfoundland.

"A valuable boon to the Church. It will give me pleasure to re-ommend them. No, 2t has been sung every Christmas Day in Turvey or centuries. The whole village comes to church at three p.m. to sing it."—ROBERT HORWOOD, Holmwood Cottage, Turvey.

"I am very anxious to introduce into my church (St. Michael's, 'olkestone) this Christmas your beautiful book."—EDWARD HUSBAND

"We had our Carols on Christmas Day, and shall of course continue them during the season till Septuagesima. They went uncommonly well, and every one was delighted."—CAMPBELL LOCK, Chalton

"It is with great pleasure that I am able to inform you that the more we know of your book the better we like it. It is very likely that before long St. Michael's people will carol from Christmas to Lent."— CHARLES PEPPER, St. Michael's C.E. Schools, Manchester.

"This is the third year my choir have sung your Carols, and I like them exceedingly. They are a vast improvement upon the rubbish which is often sung. Having lived in the land of carols—viz., Wales—where the people go to church at six a.m. to sing them, I can speak from experience."—G. A. Poust, Curate of Wombourn.

"No such mode of praise has been used in our ancient church since the Reformation."—J. E. Sedgwick, Stanford-le-Hope Rectory.

"We use the Carols altogether, instead of hymn-books, throughout the Christmas and Epiphany season, and the people seem to appreciate the change."—T. WOOLLEN SMITH, Calverton Vicarage.

"There are some charming Carols interspersed throughout the whole book. I feel sure my congregation will appreciate them. I am rather tired of 'Ancient and Modern' for Christmas and Epiphany."— FORBES WINSLOW, St. Paul's Lodge, St. Leonards.

RUTH

MUSIC BY ALF RED K. GAUL.

"Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of erfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is othing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable acts. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympabusic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the substitution of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, Eutreat me not to leave thee, 'which is instinct with pathetic expression. . Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another Sective number. . . A chorale, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful moneption; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Perus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward ith a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An athusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Brad-ord Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic "That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic listuation is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have ver and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical reatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are tach wanted, and we believe that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard a our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to ur stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and dwacing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and muscianly—this work will be a great zvourie, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will eliked better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here be real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Ar. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning tagreets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the resh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet openful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz.

The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for sessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything 4r. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked st, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation feconsiderable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY JULIA GODDARD

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY ANDERTON.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Mr. Anderton has put forth all his strength to meet the varied demands of his subject as thus presented, and with a generally happy effect. His plan was to deal in independent fashion with each section of the book as it came, and hence the Cautata is of an old-fashioned type, in the sense that it has no representative themes. The music makes little pretence to characteristics belonging to what is called the fadwared's chool; yet it is by no means formal and pedantic, presenting rather the happy union of modern expression with testablished form, to which it would be well if all English composers adhered... The gem of the work, and one which would shine in any connection, I take to be a setting in quinter form of Shakespeare's lines, 'Some say that ever gainst that season comes,' &c. This is altogether beautiful as music, and not less in its happy expression of the feeling of the words. A man who can produce such a piece has a right to hold up his head among composers.'

"The music is melodious and pleasing, and it was received with "The music is melodious and pleasing, and it was received with much applause throughout."

"Mr. Anderton has attempted nothing more than simple and unpretentious music, and he certainly has succeeded in imparting at the same time a spice of individuality to his setting. Among the points that should be mentioned are the pretty song in the earlier part of the work, 'I had a dream last night'; the tenor song, magnificently rendered by Mr. Joseph Maas, 'Away, away, over the foaming tide'; and the Gudrun episode, which had the advantage of Madame Trebelli's splendid voice."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Mr. Prout has followed closely the lines laid down by the classical masters, having first turned a deaf ear to the counsels of their successors. The result is that we have a new symphony perfectly clear in form, so constructed as that the relation of any one part to the resiliarcadily discovered, and so scored as that the various powers of the richestra are kept in their proper places and put to a legitimate use. These are great merits to begin the part of the particular of the particular and th

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Those who are acquainted with Mr. Prout's two former Sympho-cies, and with his other thoughful and finished works, will be glad to seem that his third Symphony is an exactery in construction and as semirable in detail as either of sterularly early the third movement, Intermezo a I Espagaole, as a significant penging."

"Though in the matter of scoring his Symphony is essentially modern, yet in the flow of the music it is as straightforward as that of saving and Mozart. It is also full of brightness and vigour, and is ettain to make a favourable impression at the first hearing, because he audience will follow it with case."

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

EMIL BEHNKE CHARLES W. PEARCE.

Price Eighteenbence each. In Cloth Boards, Three Shillings each.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS. &c.

"I am much obliged to you for sending me your | elaborate work, by Messrs. Lennox Browne and Emil Voice Exercises. They seem to me admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility.

"FREDERICK A. G. OUSELEY."

"I like the Vocal Exercises very much; they are scientific, systematic, and ingenious.

"JOHN STAINER."

"This is a novel work, both in plan and detail, and the combined labours of a well-known scientific lecturer on the voice and an excellent musician have brought the undertaking to a successful issue. . . . These very complete and satisfactory training exercises are printed in six different books for the same number of voices, thus: soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, baritone, and bass. The work may be safely and cordially recommended to vocal students and even to practised singers, quite apart from any grounds of discussion concerning methods of teaching."-Musical Standard.

"The exercises are, with great skill, arranged so as to give a maximum of benefit with a minimum of fatigue. They are melodious and natural, and are consequently pleasant of performance. The accompanying pianoforte part is helpful without being either distracting or unduly prominent; and the work is throughout characterised by artistic forethought and good musicianship. Its popularity will doubtless be extensive in accordance with its merits."-Academic Gazette.

"They are constructed so as to fit in with the vocal principles which Mr. Behnke teaches, while at the same time they are melodious and interesting."-Tonic Sol-fa Reporter.

the Human Voice,' by E. Behnke, and in the more charm."-Oldham Evening Chronicle.

Behnke, entitled 'Voice, Song, and Speech.' . . . The exercises are published for each of the several ranges of voice, and from their utility and cheapness they deserve to find a very large sale."-Illustrated London News.

"These exercises are the best of the kind we have seen, and clearly printed and neatly got up. We wish the authors every success in their endeavours to facilitate the cultivation of vocal art."-Public Opinion.

"A personal experience in my own family enables me to speak in the highest terms of Mr. Behnke's method, which is absolutely invaluable for increasing the power, resonance, and flexibility of the voice, both in speaking and singing, and I am glad to be able to recommend the exercises as being thoroughly practical and most useful."-C. D., Household Words.

"The combined simplicity and utility of the plan upon which these studies have been written will commend them to the notice of professors and students alike."-Sunday Times.

OF THE

MASON & HAMLIN

THE MASON AND HAMLIN AMERICAN ORGANS still remain unrivalled; and all the great Musicians and Organists agree that these instruments are absolutely the most perfect substitutes for Pipe Organs. The models now exhibited at the Inventions Exhibition, South Kensington, contain all the latest patents and improvements, and command the attention of all connoisseurs.

At the Exhibition of Musical Instruments, at St. James's Hall, Manchester (opened on Friday, the 25th ult.), certainly the finest exhibit of American Organs ever seen is shown by Messrs. Metzler and Co., the Sole Agents for the Mason and Hamlin American Organs.

The Models comprise the celebrated Queen's Model, in black and gold case; the Liszt Organ, in mahogany and satin-wood case, as supplied to the Cunard steamships. Special models, in beautiful cases of cherrytree, maple and gold, and a very fine specimen of the Three-manual and 32 feet Pedal Organ, as used in Westminster Abbey.

MUSIC AS A MEANS OF RECREATIVE INSTRUCTION.

THE high value of recreation as an aid to instruction has long been allowed by authorities on education. But in the colossal scheme of our elementary schools there is one department in which recreative instruction is more imperatively needed than any other, and it is to the part which music must play in such recreation that we are anxious to call the attention of our readers. They may have noticed a brief allusion in the daily papers to the decision of the London School Board to adopt the system of evening classes devised by Dr. Paton, of Nottingham, but they may not have a very precise conception of the problem which these evening classes have to solve, or of the manner in which the Nottingham system attempts its solution. For the following statement of the causes which led to the inception of the scheme, and of its scope and aims, we are mainly indebted to the courtesy of the originator.

The evening classes of our board schools are in appearance the modern representative of the old night school. But there is this vital distinction, that whereas the night school offered instruction to those who had previously had little or no schooling, it is the function and aim of the evening classes to fix, retain, and if possible supplement the education of those children who have left the elementary schools and are already out at work—to bridge over the gap between the ages of thirteen and sixteen or seventeen, a most important period of life, and one during which attendance at school ceases to be enforced by the State. In Germany, where the State enforces attendance till the age of fourteen at day schools, children are obliged to devote two hours twice a week to the evening classes of the "continuation" school, till the age of sixteen is reached; and we read that in Chemnitz, in Saxony, the school of a workmen's union attracts a larger number to its evening classes than the Government school, by virtue of a fuller programme.

Statistics prove that only four per cent. of children leaving our elementary day schools are known to pursue their education in any way whatsoever. most cases they go straight on leaving school to a life of ten hours' work a day, and if evening classes are to have any success in luring them in their hours of leisure from the pursuits of larking and loafing, it can only be done by rendering them attractive and refreshing. Hence, in the front rank of the principles in the light of which such education must be carried on, Dr. Paton has placed the need for recreation, since tired children have to be dealt with. And the part which music is designed to play in this schemea part which, tried and approved at Nottingham, is already a fait accompli in London-is best described in his own words, which we make no apology for quoting :-

"There should be (1) rhythmic or musical drilli.e., calisthenic exercises, and pleasant orderly movements, accompanied and inspired by music. The bodies of the children need the refreshment of play, and their minds want the stimulus of bright companionship. Let them have these in such exercises -brighter and pleasanter than aught they can have inwardly and subtly upon rude minds and manners. and, in addition, the instinct of obedience and the love of order will grow as moral habits to ennoble their future life. There should be (2) much singing of good songs-good both in their music and their words—this, not only because of the inspiring influence of good music in itself, but because of the power it has to make whatever truth it wings on its pulsing harmonies thrill and reverberate with a strange power in the hidden places of the soul, where are the springs

With the remaining and more purely instructive portion of this scheme it is not our province to deal in detail, except to notice that especial stress is laid on the value of oral teaching for children thus circumstanced. As it is briefly but excellently put, "the eye of the youth—i.e., the working-class youth—is weary—not the ear." But we may pause for a moment to observe that valuable collateral testimony has been recently borne by independent and competent witnesses to the truth of the remarks we have just quoted. Our readers are probably aware that the clergy of the East-end of London have shown great and commendable activity in organising drum and fife bands in connection with their churches and missions, a movement to which the Bishop of London has recently lent his countenance and encouragement by preaching to a congregation of some 700 of these lads on the occasion of their annual demonstration. We shall have occasion to allude further to the sound and sensible tone of his address, and we will now, therefore, confine ourselves to the significant remarks of one of the chief promoters of the movement, the Rev. A. Osborne Jay, M.A., curate of Stepney—we quote from the Daily Chronicle of the 12th ult.: " As Mr. Jay puts it, a clergyman may preach with the eloquence of a Chrysostom, and advertise himself with the persistency of a Barnum, and yet be no nearer to the youthful males of his flock than he would before he started, but the attractions of a band bring a great number of lads within his grasp, and he is able to induce a considerable portion of them to attend Bible classes, social meetings, night schools, &c., and so influence them for good." The second public utterance which we have lately noticed, bearing upon and emphasising Dr. Paton's suggestions, is that of Dr. Crichton Browne, a name familiar in connection with the recent controversy upon over-pressure. In an interesting lecture upon "Mind and Muscle," delivered before the Birmingham Teachers' Association, he stated his opinion that dancing and deportment, if taught early in life, "may discipline large groups of motor centres into harmonious action, enlarge the dominion of the will, abolish unseemly muscular tricks and antics, develop the sense of equilibrium, and impart grace and self-confidence." And this view, so far as we can judge from the report in the Birmingham Daily Post, was shared and endorsed by one of our most distinguished surgeons, Mr. Lawson Tait.

Dr. Paton's scheme, as we have already mentioned, has advanced beyond the stage of suggestion into that of actuality. The Evening School Time Table of the Nottingham School Board, which is before us as we write, shows that just as simple experiments accompany science demonstrations, and magic-lantern pictures enliven the reading classes - historical, general, or scientific - so, apart from the time devoted to classes for singing by note, music is employed to regulate calisthenic exercises and while away the time spent by the girls in their needlework. in the street-whilst by means of them, at the same Further, monthly social gatherings for readings and time, their bodies are trained to graceful movement, music are held in the various schools, in which the and the grace wrought upon rude bodies will work managers and voluntary helpers take part; for musical instruction in evening schools depends in Nottingham, as it must in London, upon volunteer aid. What strikes us as one of the most healthy and satisfactory symptoms of the whole movement is the share given to working men in the management of these evening schools, a liberal measure which has been amply vindicated in Nottingham by the keen interest which they have displayed in their work, and by the doubling of the numbers of those attending the evening classes. To quote Dr. Paton once more, "This is pre-eminently a working man's question. It is only in the night school that his children can climb the educational ladder." And we are rejoiced to observe that the initiative in the matter, so far as London is concerned, was taken by the Trades' Council of London, who in memorialising the School Board pledged themselves "to engage the services of the most active and competent working men in each district of London, to promote in every way the success of these classes." In them the principles of recreative instruction and voluntary teaching are given broad recognition, and though late in the day we are glad of the opportunity afforded by these columns of spreading the appeal of the Provisional Committee for volunteers to aid in this movement. Names of those willing to help will be received at the School Board Offices, Victoria Embankment, until the beginning of December, in preparation for a possible extension of these classes after Christmas. Attacks on the alleged extravagant expenditure of the School Board have been frequent of late, but happily there is no-room for them in connection with this new departure, which depends for its success on the labours of love of practical philanthropists. If the gap in our great system of elementary education is to be bridged, it would seem as though it could only be done by the co-operation of the leisured and cultured classes. A wide field of activity and usefulness is thus opened out to those who have at heart the enlightenment of the masses, and musicians of all grades, from composers downwards, have it in their power to further the aims of the move-

If not qualified to teach themselves, or debarred by occupation, they may encourage others to do so, remembering that a bright and sympathetic manner in dealing with beginners is of more importance than a profound knowledge of music. The good services of ladies, who will sing with girls at their sewing classes, and teach them simple and wholesome songs and choruses, will now be in far greater demand than when this excellent practice was confined to local and detached organisations.

Another means for advancing the scheme is to be found in the establishment of Musical Guilds for working men. Such a Guild, numbering 300 working men and women, and owing its origin to the enthusiastic enterprise of a lady, is in existence in Nottingham. Singing in unison and part-singing are practised by the male and female voices separately, with monthly united meetings, and many of the members are also receiving instrumental instruction. Nottingham rendered an excellent account of itself at the recent Choral Competitions in the Albert Hall, and the opportunities now enjoyed by the working classes cannot fail to enhance still further the excellence of their achievements in this line. It should be added that one of the professed objects of the Nottingham Guild is to supply solo singers, choruses, and instrumental music at the Saturday evening entertainments in the Board Schools, and to furnish other entertainments in Mission Halls, Girls' Homes, and Young Men's Institutes, thus fulfilling the aim which Mr. Besant so rightly insists on-of rendering the people able to entertain themselves.

Finally, it is to be hoped that the demand for bright, healthy music, set to sensible words, may meet with a corresponding supply on the part of our song-writers. The modern drawing-room ditty-a miracle of ineptitude—is incongruous on the lips of the working classes. The effusions of the music-hall are put out of court by their insipid vulgarity. Let us have songs that are good and new, but let us not forget that there are hundreds of excellent but forgotten ballads which answer the needs of the case, and that quite as much good may be done by uncarthing, republishing, or arranging these for popular use as can be effected by the composition of fresh music. The intention on the writer's part to be sensible is no guarantee that he will not prove dull.

Here, for the present, we must take leave of the subject, in the hope that when next we have occasion to return to it, it may be in order to record the successful working and fruitful results of this new and admirable scheme.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS

By Joseph Bennett.

No. XVII .- SEBASTIAN BACH (continued from page 584).

We resume our history of the great Leipzig contest between Rector and Cantor at the point where Bach, having written and despatched his third appeal to the Town Council, waited for a reply.

Town Councils, as a rule, are not averse from controlling the small matters within their jurisdiction, especially when they are of that attractive personal nature which usually fills even a British House of Commons more certainly than a momentous debate. But the Town Council of Leipzig preferred, in Bach's case, a policy of "masterly inactivity." They would do nothing one way or the other. The court of ultimate appeal remained voiceless, and so the dispute went on; Ernesti being just as obstinate as Bach, and each firmly standing on his supposed rights. What the Rector did in the matter beyond thus putting his foot down and keeping it there we are not told, but the Cantor anticipated Abraham Lincoln's policy of "pegging away." He was like a great gun in one of the leisurely sieges of the eighteenth century, flinging a shot at intervals into the town just to remind the inhabitants that there was a matter in dispute outside. Thus he waited from August 20 till the following November, and, getting no answer, prepared to discharge another missile at the Council House. Just then, however, an event occurred which made him hold his hand.

As far back as 1733, the master had applied to the Elector of Saxony for an appointment as Court Composer, and would probably have received it at once but for the political troubles of the time and the absence of the monarch. Affairs having settled down somewhat in 1736, Bach renewed his petition, thinking that a Court dignity would operate in his favour with the Town Council, and tend to a happy settlement of the dispute. His second appeal met with no immediate response, and the disgusted Cantor was about sending off his fourth letter to the local authority, when the following Royal decree reached him through the hands of the Russian ambassador:—

"Decret. Vor Johann Sebastian Bach, as Composer to the King's Court Band.

"Whereas his Kingly Majesty of Poland and Serene Highness the Electoral Prince of Saxony has been graciously pleased to grant Johann Sebastian Bach—at his humble petition presented to his Majesty, and by reason of his good skill—the Predicate of Composer to the Court Band; this present decree is issued under his Kingly Majesty's most gracious personal signature November 19, 1736."

If Bach, in his simplicity, thought that a Court appointment would stimulate the drones of the Town Council into activity, and awe Ernesti into submission, the result must wofully have disappointed him. To use, with slight alteration, a famous saying of Louis XVIII., "Nothing was changed, there was only a Court Composer the more," and, as after the excommunication at Rheims, "nobody seemed one penny the worse." Hence nothing remained to do but despatch (February 12, 1737) to the Council House the letter written in November, and then held over on account of the new dignity. Observe that it restates the case precisely as though Bach credited the City Fathers with having forgotten it entirely :-

"The Rector of St. Thomas's School here, Herr M. I. A. Ernesti, has lately presumed to force upon me against my will an unfit individual as Prefect of the first Choir, which is composed of the scholars of the said School, and as I neither could nor would accept him, the said M. Ernesti forbade all the scholars that none, except his own arbitrarily appointed Prefect, should, under pain of relegation, either lead the singing of the Motett or direct it. It was thus brought about that on the following Sunday, at the afternoon service, not a single scholar would undertake to lead the singing or direct the Motett, out of fear of the threatened punishment; and, indeed, the service would have been interrupted had I not persuaded a student, who was able, to undertake these duties. By this proceeding on the part of the Rector I have not only been greatly injured and molested in my office, but have also been deprived of the respect due to me by the scholars, and thus been lowered in my position towards them. And yet according to the orders passed by your honourable Council with regard to the St. Thomas School, cap. 14, s. 4, it pertains to me to choose the Prefecti of the Choirs, without the concurrence of the H. Rector-an order which has hitherto been continuously observed both by myself and by my predecessors; and this has its reasonable grounds, since the Prefecti, according to the said School order, have to fill my, the Cantor's, place, and to conduct—as I cannot be present at the same time in all the churches, and as I have the special care and supervision of the first Choir, I must know best who is most suited to me. Therefore, secondly, the prohibition of the Rector issued to the scholars that none should sing under another Prefect is most unjust, seeing that nothing effectual can be achieved if the scholars are prevented from obeying me in all matters pertaining to the singing. In order, therefore, that these doings may have no ill result, I have the strongest grounds for moving in the matter, and am compelled in this difficulty to apply to your honours. My most humble petition, therefore, is that you will protect me in my office, and strictly enjoin the H. Rector, M. Ernesti, that he will no longer molest me in the same, that he will abstain in future from choosing Prefecti without my knowledge and consent, and from forbidding the boys to obey me in regard to the singing; that you will further be pleased to instruct the Superintendent or one of the clergy of St. Thomas's Church, without unbecoming restriction, to enjoin the school children again to render me the respect and obedience due to me, and so enable me for the future to fulfil the duties of my post. As I now trust by this, my not unreasonable petition, to obtain the protection and aid of your Worships, so I remain as before, with continual respect; your most obedient, &c .- J. S. BACH."

When he sent off the above letter Bach did not the matter into tardy and languid consideration with enquiry in a minor matter of mere discipline, or other and Royal Seal. Prepared and given at Dresden, a view to some middle course which should please both parties. Evidently they did not want to offend Ernesti, who was an excellent Head Master, or to lose Bach, who was a no less admirable Cantor. So the united wisdom of the Council hit upon the notable idea of proclaiming each in the wrong on some points, and each in the right on others. The main thing, in Bach's view, was that the Council Order permitted Krause to retain his place till Easter, when his time at the School would expire. This was no satisfaction to the Cantor, who, however, seems to have held his peace for a time. Meanwhile, another disturbance

At one of the week-day services at St. Nicholas, in April, 1737, when the organ was not used, a scholar appointed to lead the singing pitched a tune so low that the congregation were unable to join in it. Under ordinary conditions the clergy would have brought the matter under Bach's notice and left it in his hands, but such was the hostile attitude of the parties to the Krause dispute that Deyling, the Superintendent, went off at once to the Town Council with a formal complaint. Their Magnificencies woke up at once; sent for Bach, ordered him to reprove the offending scholar, and take care in future to appoint a competent person. We can imagine how our master chafed under all this, and how he brooded over his wrongs till he could remain inactive no longer. On August 21, the big gun fired a fifth shot into the Council House. By that time Bach had made up his mind that the lately-issued Order was not only unsatisfactory but illegal. Thus he set forth his case:-

"Your Magnificencies, &c., will graciously call to mind how I, under date February 12 of the present year, complained to your Honours of the Rector of the St. Thomas School, M. J. A. Ernesti, concerning his interference in my office, and also his prohibition to the scholars of obedience to me, and the consequent humiliation to me, in regard whereof I humbly craved your aid and protection. Since then, it is true, your honourable Council has sent me a decree, copy of which is enclosed under A; but, on the one hand, satisfaction is not done to me thereby for the humiliation inflicted on me by the said Rector, and, on the other hand, I am seriously aggrieved thereby. For as the Rector, publicly and in open Church, and also in presence of the entire first class, threatened all the scholars with relegation and loss of caution money if any should be disposed to obey my orders, wherefore I not unreasonably demand that my honour be reestablished; so, and in like manner, the above-named decree of the Council is based upon a School order made in 1723, which differs materially and in many points from the old School orders, and tends greatly to my prejudice as well in the exercise of my office and in regard to the accruing perquisites, while it has never been actually in force; for when, at one time, the promulgation thereof was to be proceeded with, the late Rector, Ernesti (Senior), declared himself against, to the effect that it should be, in the first place, sent to the honourable Consistorium, whose decision thereon was to be awaited. But the ratification has, so far as I know, not yet ensued, and I cannot therefore acknowledge a new School order so prejudicial to me, especially as the amount of my perquisites was therein to be much reduced, and the old order must still continue in force. The aforesaid decree of the Council, based as it is on the new order, cannot therefore remedy the matter. More especially impracticable is that part of it which declares that it shall not be competent for me to suspend a scholar who has once been appointed to a function, much less to remove him therefrom. For cases occur where a know that the Council, six days before, had taken change has forthwith to be made, and where a detailed school affair, cannot be undertaken. Such changes render me obedience in my arrangements. do in all lesser schools belong to the province of the Cantor, as it would be impossible to control the youths if they knew that one could not at once deal with them, and in other respects too it would be hopeless to fulfil the duties of one's office satisfactorily. Your honours have required to be informed on this matter, and I herewith again make my most humble petition: that your Worships will protect me in the exercise of my office, and ensure me the needful respect; that you will prohibit all undue interference on the part of the Rector, M. Ernesti; also, to restore my honour with the scholars, which has, through the instrumentality of the said Rector, been wounded, and that you will give the necessary instructions to defend me against the new School order, as far as it operates against me, and prevents me from the due performance of my duties. For the aid thus to be granted, I shall, as ever, remain, with profound respect, yours, &c.—J. S. Bach."

am not molested in my jure quasitorations of appointing the Prafecti Chori Musici, and therein protect me; and—

Here, indeed, was a bomb dropped on the floor of the Council Chamber. For not only did this troublesome Cantor come worrying an easy-going lot of City Fathers for the fifth time, but he must needs tell them, in the height of his impertinence, that their late decree, as a legal document, was mere waste paper, and that even if it were legal, it would be absurd. But their Magnificencies, though probably very indignant, were not stimulated to action. They went comfortably to sleep again till roused by the Consistory, or high Church Council, with which Bach appears to have put himself into communication. "Send us," said the Consistory to the Town authorities and to Deyling, "a report on this affair within fourteen days." Before that time expired, Deyling had conveniently forgotten the mandate, and the Town Council, having perhaps winked slyly at each other, dozed off again. All this the Consistory bore with lamb-like submission, and omitted to renew the subject.

Now what was Bach to do? Give in? Never. Like the British infantry, he did not know when he was beaten, and beaten he certainly was not while he could fight the case in a higher court. This time he would carry his pleadings to the foot of the throne, and have it out with Ernesti in the very hearing of Majestic Serenity. Hence his appeal to Frederic Augustus, dated Leipzig, October 18, 1737:—
"Most Noble, Most Mighty King and Prince, Most

Gracious Sovereign:

'That your Majesty has been most graciously pleased to confer on me the title of Composer to your Majesty will command my most humble gratitude through life. As, therefore, I claim for myself in most humble confidence the protection of your Majesty, so I now venture most respectfully to beg for the same on account of my present oppressors. My predecessors, the Cantors of the St. Thomas School here, have always, and according to the traditional usage of the School, possessed the right to appoint the Prefects in the Musical Choirs, and that for the well-founded reason that they, more than any others, were in a position to know which individual was the most capable, and this prerogative I have enjoyed for a considerable time without question from any one. Nevertheless, the present Rector, M. Johann August Ernesti, has lately been bold enough to fill up a Prefecture without my concurrence, and that with an individual having very little knowledge of music. When I became aware of his incompetence, and felt under the necessity of making a change, on account of the consequent disorder in the music, and appointed in his place a more skilful person, the said Rector, although I have endeavoured to maintain my wellfounded prerogative before the magistrates here (enclosure A) and have also implored the Royal Consistory here for satisfaction (enclosure B) for the injury done me, yet from the latter I have received nothing at all, and from the former only the instructions herewith enclosed under C. Since now, most gracious King and Sovereign, the Council here completely deprive me of the right I have hitherto enjoyed, as shown by the enclosure, and in doing so rest themselves upon a new School order made in the year 1723, which I do not regard as binding on me, principally because it has never been confirmed by the Consistory. Therefore I now, in most humble submission, appeal to your Majesty-

"I. To command the Council here to see that I

"II. To be pleased to direct the Consistorium of this place to require an apology from the Rector Ernesti for the indignity done to me, and also to charge, without reserve, the Superintendent, Dr. Deyling, to instruct the entire School (catus), that all the boys of the School shall show me the customary due respect and obedience. This most exalted Royal favour I anticipate with undying gratitude, and remain in lowliest submission, your Majesty's most submissive and most dutiful—J. S. Bach."

We now approach the end of the two years' fight. The Circumlocution Office existed at Dresden, as in other capitals, but only two months elapsed before a Royal mandate was addressed to the Consistory: " Enquire what is due to Bach and let him have it. It took till February 1 to reach Leipzig, but once there it woke up the Fathers, clerical and lay. In four days the Consistory again demanded a report from the Town Council and Deyling, giving them a fortnight to prepare it in. At Easter the King himself came to Leipzig, and by his own personal intervention settled the disputed points in a manner every way favourable to Bach, who thus reaped the reward of steady and unflinching perseverance. He came out of the struggle honourably on the whole. No doubt he was impetuous and disposed to stretch his rights to the utmost; but he fought fairly, never condescending to personalities. In this he had the advantage of Ernesti, whose abuse probably helped to stimulate Bach's dogged resolution. Spitta does not publish Ernesti's letters as he does the Cantor's, but he throws light upon their foulness in the subjoined terms :-

"He (Ernesti) not only takes the opportunity of denouncing Bach to the Council in general terms as a negligent official, who was, properly speaking, alone guilty of the misfortunes of the 'unfortunate' Gottfried Krause, and as a haughty musician who thought it 'beneath him' to direct a simple Choral; he accused him of never having given the Prefect a lesson or rehearsal in conducting, so as to lead him into a snare; and he charges him with 'a lie' because Bach only mentions the appointment of Johann Krause as Prefect in the New Church, and does not allude to his former place as fourth Prefect in the New Year's singing. He does not hesitate even to represent Bach as corruptible by bribery, and says he could adduce yet other evidence that Bach's testimony is not always to be depended on, and that he, for his part, would sooner make a discantist (treble singer) out of an old specie thaler than out of this boy, who was no more fit for the place than he him-Ernesti, not only directly opposed me, but also, to self was. Such accusations as these no man should my greatest affront and humiliation, forbade all the utter without proof on the spot, and in default of this assembled scholars, under pain of 'baculation,' to he is a slanderer."

The results of the quarrel were disastrous to the musical interests of the School. Ernesti, and with him the other masters, discountenanced the art out of spite towards Bach. If the Rector saw a boy practising any instrument he would sneeringly ask: "Do you want to be a beer-fiddler?" So, by one means and another, Bach and his work were "sent to Coventry." At first he retaliated; amongst other things taking for himself every privilege which Ernesti exercised in the way of neglecting duty, and "coming neither to table nor to prayers." Eventually, however, he withdrew as much as possible from the exercise of his office, never publicly appeared as Cantor, and devoted himself to other and more congenial work.

The Bach-Ernesti story has been told here at full length, but no apology is needed on that account. It throws a clear light on some important traits in the master's character, and it marks the period when music, as far as exemplified in him, began to assert a wholesome independence of its whilom nursing fathers and nursing mothers.

Let us now change the scene, and regard the master in his more closely personal and domestic relations. We may do this the more fittingly here because we have followed Bach's public career to its highest point. From the close of the Ernesti quarrel to the Cantor's death, he enjoyed the fullest distinction possible to the degree in which his genius was understood. No musician visited Leipzig without paying his homage to the great master, and when he himself went abroad, to Dresden or-as on a memorable occasion to be noticed later-to Berlin, the honours he received were such as he well deserved.

Bach appears to have been happy in the quiet home life lived under the shadow of St. Thomas's Church. Four children by his first wife accompanied him to the Cantor's residence, and seven daughters and six sons were presented to him by the second sharer of his joys and sorrows. His house was therefore full, and paternal cares must have weighed heavily upon him. Death often knocked at his door to take away a little one; out of the thirteen forming the second family only six-three sons and as many daughters-living to maturity, and of these one, Gottfried Heinrich, was an imbecile, legally incapable of managing his affairs, yet inheriting a genius which his brother, Emanuel, termed "great." father, the master was irreproachable. He looked well after the education of his children, and took the keenest interest in the development of his musical sons, Friedemann and Emanuel, even to the extent of copying with his own hand any music of theirs which pleased him. No trouble was too great if by putting himself to it he could promote the welfare of his family. Above all, he was quick to avail himself of openings for their advancement in the musical profession. Some evidence of this is still extant. Here, for example, is a letter by which, in 1735, he secured an organist's post at Mühlhausen for Bernhard, the third son of his first marriage:-

"Most Noble and most Learned Gentlemen, and particularly most Worshipful Senior (of the Council), most Esteemed Patron:

"It has come to my knowledge that Herr Hetzehenn, organist to the town of Mühlhausen, died not long since in that town, and that his place has not yet been filled up. Now my younger son, Johann Gottfried Bernhard Bach, has for some time made himself so skilful in music that I undoubtedly consider him perfectly competent and capable to compete for the vacant post of Town Organist. I therefore request you, most noble gentlemen, with all reverence and submission, that you will be pleased to vouchsafe to my son your invaluable intercession for the obtain- ing on the financial part of the question. An excuse

ing of the post he applies for, and so to fulfil my desires and make my son happy; so that I hereby once more, as before for former favours, now again may find ample cause to assure you that I remain, with unalterable devotion, Your Honours', and particularly your most Worshipful Senior's most devoted servant,-Joh. SEBAST. BACH, formerly Organist to the Church Divi Blas at Mühlhausen.

In accordance with the cumbrous style of the period, the foregoing letter was addressed "To the Most Noble and Learned Herr, Herr Tobia Rothochieren, the Illustrious Juris Consultas and Honourable Member as well as Most Worthy Senior of the Learned and Wise Council of the Imperial and Free

Town of Mühlhausen, at Mühlhausen. 59
We have a grateful glimpse of the Master in connection with the only marriage that ever took place from his house. This was the union of his eldest daughter, Elizabeth, with Altnikol, a "former beloved scholar," for whom, as his prospective son-in-law, he quickly obtained an organist's place at Naumberg. It appears that in view of the wedding the Cantor's cousin, Elias Bach, who lived at Schweinfurth, sent a cask of wine. Sebastian lost no time in acknowledging the attention, writing under date November 2,

"Most Worshipful and Respected Cousin:

"That you and your dear wife are still well, I was assured by your gratifying letter received yesterday with the splendid little cask of new wine, for which hereby accept my thanks as due. It is, however, much to be regretted that the little cask has suffered either from some jar in the carriage of it, or other accident, for after opening it in this place it was found almost a third part empty, and, according to the report of the inspector, now contains but six Kannen; for indeed it is a pity that of so noble a gift of God the smallest part should have been wasted. However, for the good gift I have received from my worthy cousin, I am heartily obliged, though I must pro nunc confess my inability to take any worthy revenge. However, quod differtur non affertur, I hope to have an opportunity, when I may in some way repay my debt. It is much to be regretted that the distance between our towns does not allow of our visiting each other in person, else I would take the liberty of humbly inviting my respected cousin to my daughter Leissgen's wedding, which is to take place in the next month of January, 1749, to the new organist of Naumberg, Herr Altnikol. But, in consequence of the above-mentioned difficulty, and also of the inconvenient season, I cannot allow myself to hope to see you with us in person: I will only beg you, in your absence, to help them with your Christian good wishes, wherewith I beg to recommend myself to my worthy cousin's remembrance, and, with warmest greetings to you from all here, I remain your honour's most devoted and faithful cousin and servant to command,—Joh. Seb. Bach."

A postscript to this letter shows Bach as a prudent

"Although my good cousin kindly offers to assist me in procuring the same liquor again, I must decline on account of the excessive expense here; for the freight was 16 gr.; the delivery at the house, 2 gr.; the inspector, 2 gr.; the town excise, 5 gr. 3 pf.; and the general excise, 3 gr.; so my good cousin may calculate that it costs me nearly 5 gr. per measure-which is somewhat too much for a present.'

So kindly Elias Bach, of Schweinfurth, had to keep his wine for home consumption, with, perhaps, a little wonderment at his famous cousin's plain speakis easily found for Sebastian's seeming ungracious- illustrious musician: "Where would the fiddle be ness. Economy was a necessity in his house, all the more because the laws of hospitality were carefully observed. Rarely, we are told, was the Cantorial residence empty of visitors, while the Cantorial dignity had at all times to be maintained, and the house-father had, therefore, rigidly to supervise the outflow of groschen to the end of mere luxuries. Bach, moreover, recognised the principle of thrift by saving a little cash now and then. The aggregate amount was not much, and as the good-natured master lent it to relatives, the chances are it contributed little to his material enjoyments. On one point he certainly did permit himself a little extravagance. His house was crowded with musical instruments, and contained, when he died, six claviers, not counting four bestowed upon his youngest son, Johann Christian, a lute, two lautenclaviare, viol da gamba, "and violins, violas, and violoncellos in such number that he could supply enough for any of the more simple kinds of concerted music." But this natural weakness for the machinery of his craft seems to have been his only one. For the rest he was a prudent, respectable, and dignified citizen, paying every man his due, looking well after his wife and family, kind-hearted to those of the outside circle who stood in need, and God-fearing, but withal proud, impetuous, tenacious of rights and privileges, insisting upon a return of the respect he paid to others, and always ready to magnify his office and exalt his vocation. Such men have the heroic element in their naturethe "divine relation which, in all times," says Carlyle, "unites a great man to other men" by the ties of sympathy and admiration.

A LECTURE ON SPINETS, HARPSICHORDS, AND CLAVICHORDS

By A. J. HIPKINS.

READ IN THE MUSIC ROOM OF THE INTERNATIONAL INVENTIONS EXHIBITION, OCTOBER 21 AND 23, 1885.

My intention is to describe the keyboard or clavier stringed instruments, instruments that were the precursors of the pianoforte, with particular reference to some that are in the Historic Loan Collection, and I have, by permission of the owners, chosen from that Collection a spinet, two harpsichords, and a clavicherd, to illustrate, by the performance of compositions written expressly for them, the qualities of those obsolete instruments. In description and illustration, I propose to follow that historic order which has governed the formation and arrangement of the Loan Collection in its musical instruments, its manuscripts and books.

I wish it to be observed that my aim is to show spinets and clavichords as they were, and not as they may be conceived from the transference of the music composed for them to the piano. To reject, in short, nearly all the marks of expression, and certain alterations introduced in modern piano editions. The necessity for this may be proved by trying to play those editions on the original instruments. I do not intend to imply that the old clavier music had no expression; far from it. I mean to say, the kind of expression was different. I admit that, transferred to the piano, the spinet, clavichord, and also organ compositions must be treated according to piano requirements, and also, that the reading of a good pianist has a high value for the student when thus recorded. There has been a development in pianoforte music, that has gone on step by step with the enlargement of the powers of that instrument. The makers have had their share in this development without the bow?" elucidates this union of complementary talents, and their common interdependence. Development, however, is not reconcilable with a ruling tradition. The rendering of Bach's Fortyeight Preludes and Fugues, by Beethoven, of which Czerny speaks so highly, and which can have been nothing else than great, must have really been Bach plus Beethoven, and the clavichord or harpsichord Bach played upon, plus the piano as Beethoven knew it. To talk of tradition where change has been active is to too lightly claim its authority. I believe that manner of performance may reveal itself to the earnest and sympathetic student, but can hardly be correctly handed down through a chain, in which each link has demonstrably altered. Let me specially refer to the performance of M. Dumon on the onekeyed flute, and of M. Jacobs on the viola da gamba, in the Belgian Historic Concerts, which took place in this music room; and to the Dutch Historic Concerts in the Royal Albert Hall, conducted by Mr. Daniel de Lange. The latter consisted of compositions belonging to a school of music, the old Netherlandish, of all others esteemed to be dry and mechanical. Yet, illuminated by the fervour of patriotic sympathy, those dry bones were recalled to life, and Josquin des Près, Obrecht, Orlandus Lassus, and Sweelinck were again within touch. Their dialect might be old and somewhat strange, but its accents still excited our emotions. We cannot pretend to obtain similar results with obsolete keyboard instruments, which, at their best, have little fetching power when compared with the human voice, or even bowed instruments. Their evanescent tone and its small energy tell against them.

Our modern harmonic music and our musical instruments appear to have arrived at definite form and intention in the fifteenth century, in the same century that oil painting and printing from movable types, which was to bring so important a change to the intellectual currents of the world, were introduced. The modern keyboard, with its twelve semitones in the octave-a contrivance an early writer, Virdung, suggests was founded on the study of Boethius, and an attempt to restore the chromatic genus of the old Greeks-also the power of grasping the octave with the hand, were certainly in existence in 1432, when the famous altar-piece at Ghent, the Adoration of the Lamb, painted by the brothers Van Eyck, was completed. The St. Cecilia panel, the original of which is now at Berlin, shows this keyboard applied to a Positive organ, and the player is represented as sounding with two hands the common chord of F. The Holyrood St. Cecilia, by an unknown painter of the Flemish school, formerly at Hampton Court, is of later date, about 1484. Here again is a chromatic keyboard to a Positive organ. The church painted in the picture, in which the organ stood, was the old Trinity Church of Edinburgh, which no longer exists. I will, in passing, mention that the keyboard and arrangement of the pipes bear witness thus early to what organ-builders call a "short octave" or "short measure" bass. The keyboard, or clavier stringed, instruments were in existence in the fifteenth century, and perhaps earlier; but their use could not have been much extended until nearly the end of that period. There is scarcely any contemporary reference to them, but we may assume, whether their keyboards were chromatic or diatonic, that they were identical with those organ manuals in which an octave could be stretched, and that any peculiarities, such as short or incom-plete octaves in the one, would be likely to exist, as I have found to be the case, in the other. To the with the composers and pianists. The enquiry of an interval between the date (1484) of the Holyrood St.

Cecilia and 1511, I attribute the clavicytherium, or Western civilisation about the year 1500. An Italian upright spinet, contributed to the Loan Collection by named Sagudino, who, as Secretary to an Embassy, Count Giovanni Correr, of Venice. The style of the visited England in the reign of Henry VIII., has left remarkable internal decoration is that of the time an interesting account of the cultivation of music in when rocks and calvaries abounded in painting. It is quite an Albrecht Dürer background; the figures, doubtless once there, have disappeared. The outside case, being later, need not detain attention. The Flamboyant window, which serves for one of the roses in the soundboard, could hardly have been after 1500. I think we have in this remarkable instru-ment the oldest clavier at present known. A strip of manuscript in the interior proves its Swabian origin, and as Ulm is mentioned, the instrument was very likely made at Augsburg. It is a spinet because it has the usual spinet-jack, or mechanical plectrum, acting on the single string that makes the note for each key; and the setting the instrument upright, by which it became a clavicytherium, merely needed a simple contrivance for the return of the jack, as we find to be the case. To describe a jack: it is a light wooden upright lifter that carries a centred tongue, also of wood, and a cutting of quill that projects and serves as a plectrum to twang the string. The jack, when raised by the key, causes the sound, and the sound is damped by a small piece of cloth attached to the jack. In Count Correr's instrument the little plectrum was of metal, not quill. Perhaps the use of metal for plectra preceded that of quill. In the eighteenth century the quill was sometimes replaced by leather. Scaliger, who was born in 1484, and was a native of the Venetian States, wrote in after life that he remembered the introduction in his boyhood of the little plectra to clavier instruments; and from these points resembling thorns, the instruments previously called arpichordum and clavicymbalum, but commonly monochords, became known as spinet; that is to say, he derived spinetta, the Italian name, from spina, the Latin and Italian name for thorn. But another derivation of the word spinet, although not so taking as Scaliger's, has been lately found. It is that the name came from a Venetian clavier-maker called Spinetti, who, about the year 1500, adapted the clavicymbal, hitherto of irregular angles, into a rectangular case, and from him this new instrument became known as spinetta. Virdung, to whom I have already referred, who was a priest at Basel, and had published, in 1511, a treatise in Loan Collection where the latter names are actually the German language on musical instruments, knew nothing of spinet; with him the trapeze clavier was a clavicymbalum, and the rectangular one a virginal, a name which had already found recognition in England. Virdung's woodcuts represent the clavi-cordium, the clavicymbalum, the virginal, and the claviciterium; also the chromatic and diatonic keyboards, the last being already obsolete. I will describe the clavichord later on. The claviciterium, according to Virdung, was an upright virginal with gut strings, and was a new invention. He says he had only seen one. Perhaps the gut strings were an experiment, as Count Correr's upright instrument had certainly metal wires. Virdung cannot pretend to say when the other instruments were invented; he surmises, as we still surmise, that the clavicymbalum was a psaltery, an instrument like a dulcimer, to to which a keyboard had been put; and the clavicordium a monochord, or, properly, polychord, similarly treated. The Latin names point to a time when these instruments were only used in monasteries or collegiate establishments; the Italian spinetta and arpicordo occur when their use had extended to the laity, and the claviers began to cope with the lutes and viols, and other favourite instruments of the Renaissance. They thus took their part in the great secular change which came over our that of the clavichord; and spinet, harpsichord, and an interesting account of the cultivation of music in that monarch's family and Court. Little Mary Tudor's precocity astonished him. He names the clavier she played upon, clavicimbanum, a variant of the true name. The late Rawdon Brown in translating Sagudino's letters, rendered this word harpsichord, but adds that he should have used spinet. Rimbault, in his valuable and indispensable work, "The Pianoforte," quotes from Rawdon Brown's translation, but substitutes, without comment, "virginal," wherever harpsichord occurs. He made this change of names to support a theory that has no foundation in fact, by which the clavicytherium, through an imaginary series of keyed-stringed instruments-the clavichord, the virginal, the spinet, and the harpsi-chord—was supposed to have led up in that order to the pianoforte. I take this opportunity to warn the student against this fallacious pedigree, which has been too generally accepted. In another sense, however, which Rimbault had not grasped, the word "virginal" would be correct. I mean that general understanding of "virginal," as the common name for any clavier with jacks, that prevailed in this country from the reign of Henry VII. to the Commonwealth. Usually a pair of virginals and a pair of clavichords or organs were said, as a pair of steps or stairs is now used, meaning gradation in the old sense of the keys, as steps through the intervals of the scale.

The regal was properly a small reed organ. attribute to regal from regula (a rule), a similar derivation due also to the keyboard. Queen Elizabeth's virginal, in the Historic Tudor Room of the Loan Collection, is really a spinet, being in a trapeze form, and an Italian one; but, as I have said, in her time and later it would, in England, have been called a virginal, the special name, which was at that time foreign, not having come into general use until the Restoration. This interesting instrument is of the same kind, and is very little, if any, later in date, than the beautiful Paduan spinet of 1550, lent by the Royal Conservatoire of Brussels to the Historic Collection. All these trapeze spinets were "short octave" instruments, the lowest B or E keys, as we regard them, sounding G or C. There are two instances in the written upon the keys, the Paduan instrument being one of them. We are concerned to know what music was played upon such instruments? It was neither more nor less than voice parts, in the same way as the lute and other favourite instruments, such as the families of viois, flutes, cromornes, schalmeys, and bombards, and, of course, the organ and regals were also played. Counterpoint was applied to popular dance measures, to the brisk as well as to the stately. There was no accompaniment distinct from the voice parts until recitative and the basso continuo were introduced about the year 1600, but the player had always the license of variations by which he could display fancy and executive proficiency. Wherever there is cultivation of music, melodic or harmonic, in any part of the world, varying a theme is always the musician's resource. We owe discant, and the musician's resource. finally the harmonies and rhythmic figuration of our modern music to this natural tendency. The fingering, which at first had been of the rudest, gradually improved, and was nearly settled by J. S. Bach and his sons as we have it now. It has been perfected by the great pianists of this century. It was not till Purcell's time that the use of the thumb came to be understood. It must be borne in mind the touch of the spinet and harpsichord is quite different from clavichord also differ from that of the pianoforte, inasmuch as they demand less impetus of blow. It is difficult to describe the harpsichord touch: it may be legato or mezzo-stacatto, and has affinity to the touch of the organ. The old harpsichord players could not, however, have divined the variety of touch the modern pianoforte could have taught them. The clavichord touch is essentially legatissimo, with a very shallow fall or depression of the key. Both instruments require arpeggio chords, as chords of simultaneous notes have no satisfactory tone. I will play upon a spinet, one of old Jacob Kirkman's, dated 1755, to illustrate the clavier music of the Elizabethan era, a Pavana entitled "The Earl of Salisbury," a "Galiardo," and an air called "Sellenger's Round," with variations, by William Byrd (1538 (?) to 1623), the composer of "Non Nobis Domine"; also, the "Courante Jewel," by Dr. John Bull (1563 to 1628). I would have used the more appropriate Brussels spinet of 1550, which is in playing order, had not the size of the room required an instrument of greater power. There is a fine portrait of Bull in the Loan Collection, lent by the University of Oxford. I have had the spinet tuned according to the temperament or division of the scale that was in vogue when that music was composed, by which the keys with no, or few, sharps or flats had good major thirds. This division is known as the mean tone temperament.

There was another early clavier, to which I have incidentally referred, the arpichordum or arpicordo. I think, notwithstanding the description in Praetorious's "Syntagma," it was the long harp-shaped clavicymbalum and lineal descendant of the "Stromento di Porco," or Pig's-head Psaltery. Of this form Virdung seems to have no knowledge; at least, he gives no woodcut or description of it. Known in this country as the harpsichord, with an "s" inserted, it has kept the name of clavicembalo in Italy, the Italian form of clavicymbalum. And, by casting off the final syllables, it became, in France, the clavecin. The French accepted the thorny derivation of the spinetta, changing the word, according to their language, to espinette, later épinette.

We find in the long harpsichord the single string of the spinet increased to two, tuned in unison for each note, the power of twanging both at one time being gained by having two jacks to each key, and so arranging the scale of stringing that the jacks should have their plectra or striking points outwards. By stops similar to those in the organ the two registers of jacks could be shifted so that the player had at command a forte of two unisons, or a piano by reverting to the single string of the spinet; and by two keyboards, one above the other, again borrowed from the organ, it became possible to contrast the forte and piano, an advance in the direction of modern expression.

Although the increase and decrease of crescendo and diminuendo do not belong to the capabilities of the harpsichord and spinet, there is a continually varying quantity of sound heard, as in the organ, owing to the number of parts that may be going on, and their position in the scale, thus redeeming these instruments from utter monotony.

Old records show that harpsichords, or virginals, as they were called, with stops, and possibly double keyboards, were imported into this country in the reign of Henry VIII. The absence of stops in the oldest harpsichord known, the fine Roman clavicembalo of 1521, now in the South Kensington Museum, is not evidence against their having been originally an Italian invention; but, all things considered, I am inclined to attribute this improvement and the double keyboard to the clavier-makers of the Netherlands.

The octave register, with its row of jacks, derived, as we shall see, from the little movable octave spinet, has been long attributed to that great harpsichord and virginal maker, Hans Ruckers, the elder, of Antwerp. It was introduced in the last quarter of the sixteenth century. English harpsichord making does not appear to have begun before that time. The oldest English harpsichords in the Loan Collection are not of earlier date than the end of the seventeenth century. One is by Thomas Hitchcock, a famous spinet-maker, and has four registers, including the "lute." The other, by Francis Coston, also of London, has the unisons and octave without lute, and with the short octave bass. The Italian spinetta traversa, or transverse spinet, was a modification of the spinet due to the harpsichord, the tuning-pins being, as in the latter instrument, immediately above the keyboard. It was a more powerful instrument than the ordinary spinet. A smaller one, tuned an octave higher, which, used in combination with the larger instrument—as may be seen in Messrs. Chappell's combined virginal and movable spinet in the Loan Collection-led to the adoption of the octave register in the harpsichord, was known as the ottavina. rectangular spinet, or virginal proper, bore in Italy the designation spinetta a tavola, or table spinet. It became a fashion to make these rectangular virginals like the "cassone," or large Italian wedding coffers, and in that form, but with Flemish decoration, they were introduced into this country at the same time as the transverse spinetfrom the earliest existing specimens, I should say during the Commonwealth, but it might have been

There are several fine English virginals of this fashion in the Loan Collection, but they do not appear to have remained long in vogue. The transverse spinet, on the contrary, took firm root in English ground, and our Collection is rich in specimens, dating from 1664 to 1784, or thereabouts. The most noted makers have been Charles Haward, Stephen Keene, and Thomas and John Hitchcock. Samuel Pepys bought a Haward spinet. He says in

"April 4, 1668 .- To White Hall. Took Aldgate Street in my way and there called upon one Haward that makes Virginalls, and there did like of a little espinette, and will have him finish it for me: for I had a mind to a small harpsichon, but this takes up less room." On July 10 he withdrew from the purchase, to return, however, on the 13th to agree to it. On July 15, Pepps writes: "At noon is brought home the espinette I bought the other day of Haward: costs me £5." There are two Haward spinets in the Loan Collection, one on a triangular stand, resembling the "triangle" which Pepys bought afterwards. Early in the eighteenth century the long harpsichord became more prominent. It was then an instrument with two unisons and an octave, and a lute stop on the upper keyboard, which gained its oboe quality of tone by twanging the strings near the wrestplank bridge. After this addition came the mute or buff stop, and also occasionally one or more rows of jacks with morocco leather plectra. A pedal, the left one, effected an easy combination for the player of the lute, and one of the unisons, the former upon the upper, the latter, which could be muted, on the lower keyboard, making a pleasing contrast. The right pedal brought into operation a swell, the perfection of which was attained when Shudi, in 1769, patented the Venetian swell, since indispensable in the organ, to which it was soon transferred.

Italian invention; but, all things considered, I am inclined to attribute this improvement and the double keyboard to the clavier-makers of the Netherlands. in this country the most celebrated makers. Their instruments in the Loan Collection would form by the desire to give the clavichord its right place beside themselves an exhibition of interest.

I will now play upon two harpsichords (one by Shudi dated 1771, and one by Shudi and Broadwood, dated 1781) a Prelude, Saraband and Cebell (or Gavotte), composed by Henry Purcell (1658 to 1695); a Menuetto and the air, with variations, known as the "Harmonious Blacksmith," by Handel (1685 to 1759), and a Sonata, by Domenico Scarlatti (1683 to 1757). This selection will show the special characteristics of the harpsichord and its limitations. But it must be remembered that the adornment of shakes, turns, and other graces were more cultivated in the best days of the harpsichord than emphasis, accent, and those ever-varying changes of power that help to make our modern music what it is. I must not omit to say that the belief once prevalent among musicians, and that I find still exists, that Scarlatti's handcrossings were due to the use of two keyboards, is not justified. Technically the hand-crossings are intentional, and, moreover, double keyboard harpsichords have found little favour in his, or at any time, in Italy. I come now to the clavichord, the oldest of the clavier family. Derived from the monochord, it must have long been restricted to its original use as the singer's guide and support. Its power of expression was not recognised, and it could hardly compete in other attractions with the brilliant spinet, when once the latter became known. Although improved and gradually extended in size and compass, it remained with its monochord peculiarity of two or more notes produced from the same string, and it was not until the epoch of John Sebastian Bach, that this economical construction was done away with, and each key, having its own strings, became independent of its neighbour. The expressive character of the clavichord has only found due recognition in Germany. In point of fact, it is the most directly expressive and, so to speak, intimate of all the claviers in this directness, even in this respect surpassing the pianoforte. And it was this that endeared it to Bach and his elder sons. Bach's third son, Carl Philip Emmanuel, has left a treatise on clavier playing, in which he speaks of the clavichord with enthusiasm. He says, to quote one passage only, "One can bring out on the clavichord all kinds of forte and piano significantly and clearly, almost more than on any other instrument." The tone of the clavichord is to us weak and ineffective, not as might be supposed as a result of age, for I have heard new clavichords and know from experience that little was gained in power by their newness. The conception of the Bachs in this respect differed from ours. It is a prevalent helped the advance of the pianoforte. There is no passage, even in the last edition of Emmanuel Bach's "Versuch," that can be made to show he had any liking for the pianoforte or that it influenced either his father's or his own compositions. The sound of the clavichord is produced by a simple tangent or flattened pin of brass, which sets the strings in vibration and makes a bridge for them by one and the same movement when the key goes down. The strip of cloth, woven about the strings beyond the tangents, damp the strings excepting while the tangents are in action. The low price of the German clavichord may have assisted to keep it in use for some years after the pianoforte had become general. Clavichords were made until the beginning of this century. A few years since they were entirely forgotten excepting by some of the oldest German musicians. Carl Engel was the first to bring the clavichord again into notice, acquiring such principle of polyphony—i.e., even demonstrativeness instruments as he could find. He inspired me with of the parts—in favour of the principle—the enhance-the spinet and harpsichord.

I will terminate this Lecture by playing on a clavichord the First Prelude, by J. S. Bach (1685 to 1750). It will be the best introduction to the instrument for those who are not yet acquainted with its tone. I will conclude with perhaps the greatest composition ever inspired by it, the Fantasia Chromatica of the same composer. The instrument is by Hass, of Hamburg, and is dated 1743, and the fine harpsichord Mdlle. Ulmann played upon with so much effect in the Belgian Historic Concert was by the same maker. The clavichord is tuned in equal temperament, that division of the scale advocated by the Bachs by which the major thirds are all equally rough or sharp. The Fantasia Chromatica is replete with and owes some of its peculiar charm to chords of the Diminished Seventh, which created, I may say, by Equal Temperament are only endurable when the tuning is according to that system now universally employed for organs and pianofortes.

THE EFFECT OF THE FUGAL IMPULSE UPON MUSIC:

THE great difference between the fugal writing of Handel and his followers in the sacred field lies in these considerations. In the case of Handel's subject, the idea is expressed completely in the subject itself, which, whilst being original and possessing true melodic form, seldom aims at special melodic beauty, and does not demand special harmonic treatment. It belongs rather to the homophonal style than the harmonic; yet, though not enhanced by harmony, it still acquires a considerably added force from its multiplication and the various forms of presentation involved in its fugal treatment. This is quite a different kind of power from that of special harmony. It is akin to that power which is contained in the general effect of natural objects, as in the case of a field of flowers—the power of repetition and multiform presentation, whilst the power unfolded by special harmonic effect is the power of massive incitation. Both powers may conjointly operate both in Music and Nature. Handel thus (we are referring to his fugal constructions) relies not on melodic beauty or special harmony, but on force and truth of character in his themes, and that chasteness of form which lends itself easily to fugal treatment as well as to declamatory effect. On the other hand, Haydn and Mendelssohn were, beyond all things, the inaugurators of new melodic and harmonic idioms; they were not merely great composers, but they opened new paths. But the new spirit which they breathed into the art did not become manifest in fugue. From those portions of their choruses which are fugal to those which are not there is a great leap in pure effect. In the fugal portions a sense of structural effort thrusts itself strongly upon the attention, whilst in the plain portions all is inspiration. In the case of Handel a certain homogeneousness embraces the whole; the fugal effect is the effect naturally inspired for consummating the expression. From numerous examples we cite the chorus, "Let us break their bonds asunder.

But the feeling for harmony not only impels the composer of the modern period to set aside the principle of polyphony—i.e., even demonstrativeness ment of a particular part; but, in some cases, it dominates entirely the arrangement of the parts, leaving no independent effect to any part. This is illustrated in the following examples:-

Mendelssohn, after the ebullition of expressional activity which teems in "St. Paul," seems to have considered it undesirable to combine the great development. There is also evidence of this feeling in other composers of high creative power-M. Gounod, for instance. Thus, in several of the great works of the modern period we find that imitative effects involving rich modern harmony are comparatively short, as in the case of the last two illustrations. In the case of the episode from "Elijah" (the last example), we may observe parenthetically that the harmony demands, for adequate definition, the stronger and more decided enunciation of the orchestra, which here encroaches on the vocal domain.

This return to needful simplicity—to masterful clearness-Mendelssohn exhibits in his great hymn, instinct with genius and sacred fervour, "Lauda

Sion."

Before quitting this subject of clearness—the one word which expresses, if one word can express, the technical aim of all laws of composition, and the great test of all technical procedure-we may point out that Handel has foreshadowed the modern practice of rendering the vocal construction simple when the accompaniment is an important factor in the expression, and consequently elaborate. In the following example it is observable that the accompaniment aims at special suggestiveness, whilst the vocal structure is imitative in form. Not only, however, is this imitation of a very simple character, but the subject itself is peculiarly simple, brief, and striking. Hence every vocal phrase, as well as the accompaniment, stands out in perfect clearness-

It will be here apparent how important to the successful use of the fugal form is the power of consummating subject; upon this depends the attainment of that important element in effect-marked contrast of themes. This faculty of contrast of theme is perhaps the crucial test of creative power. To attain it is the composer's great difficulty; want of it, his besetting weakness, and the besetting want in a large portion of musical art. The very nature of music renders contrast of theme difficult; it also renders the greatest contrast possible in this region of effect far inferior to the greatest sense of contrast we are capable of conceiving. Our highest sense of contrast is that which we obtain through the visual sense. The reason is that here the contrast is not confined to that between impressions of a single sense; it is contrast to which the differences of impression of various senses contribute. For instance, the contrast of land and water is not only the contrast of pure visual impressions, but also of impressions of touck, accessories of modern harmonic effect and the freer of muscular resistance as well as of diverse associause of instrumental illustration, with elaborate fugal tions. On the other hand, musical contrast, as we have implied, is produced by difference of impression upon a single sense.*

In tracing the progress of the fugal impulse we have seen that in the modern period it is accompanied by tendencies other than fugal, which unfold in new harmonic and melodic effects, the development of which in choral music—combined with the increasing importance of the accompaniment—has necessitated considerable curtailment of fugal elaboration. From this we do not infer that the rôle of the fugue is played out in choral music, but that its effective employment is only consistent with certain conditions.

THEMATIC TREATMENT.

Another high aspect of musical art, in which the far-off impulse which led to the fugue is still traceable, is exemplified in those modern instrumental movements of which the principle of construction is termed thematic treatment.

Into this style of composition counterpoint, in the shape of synchronous or partly synchronous themes of generally similar form, does not, as in the case of the fugal structure, enter largely. The following is an example-

The following examples exhibit this mode of construction so conformed as to embrace the freer re-

The last example, as well as the following, is an example of counterpoint of imitative form:—

Free counterpoint is an important element in thematic treatment. Examples—

This subject is considered more fully in "Some Reflections upon Musical Art considered in its Wider Relations."

Counter-melodic effect is also an element. Example—

Thus far it is visible that in thematic treatment the composer first consummates a theme or subject, as in the case of the fugue, and the subsequent effect is connected with the theme through some application of the art of counterpoint, the conditions being such as to permit wider range and more varied form in the passages, and enlarged scope for harmonic and rhythmic display. But in thematic treatment subsequent effect is also connected with the theme by other and subtler liens than those of counterpoint pure and simple. The following are a few examples:—

Where the subject gives rise to an onward flow of melodic outline different from it in character—

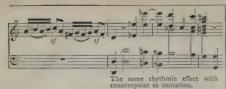

Where the counter-subject leads to a new form of outline—

Where rhythmic effect alone, borrowed from the subject, leads to new effect—

Where harmonic prompting, having independent effect, is connected rhythmically with the subject—

In the following example the first and second subjects, as well as a rhythmic effect suggested by the first subject, are all connected by a continuous counterpoint—

In the following example a new start of effect is obtained by simply reversing the beginning of the subject—

We have referred to the principle of repetition which plays so great a part in the effect of nature upon our faculties. This principle plays also a great part in art; it is observable in all the larger forms of music both vocal and instrumental. The repetition of the subject is an important means of effect in the classical instrumental movement, and the modification of the subject for the purpose of repetition is another element of thematic treatment. Example—

In the following example, whilst the form of the subject is but slightly altered, the melodic character is quite changed—

The above are only illustrations of a few out of many ways in which the most varied scopes of effect are caused to unfold connectedly and, as it were, from a common nucleus. The expressional instinct which gives rise to these different modes of development is the instinct of unity. In fact, thematic treatment may be described as a mode of composition in which the composer restricts himself to the following two kinds of prompting: First, that of which the ideas have connectedness in some outward feature; secondly, that of which the ideas are thrown off in the same breath of inspiration. The problem of the composition of an instrumental movement is thisto combine important dimensions with unity. For art effect to exist there must, as we have already stated, be progressiveness, cumulation; and these demand connectedness by a unifying element. In a fugue this unity is produced by the close relatedness of parts. If the composition is for voices the words aid in giving unity. This is the case in the Handelian chorus where the fugal form is free, and where sometimes independent effect is introduced, prompted entirely by the words. Thus in the chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb," after one of the repetitions of the subject, a new form of movement is introduced sharply-

But in the case of an instrumental movement the fundamental elements of effect are not curtailed by the limits of the human voice; both melodic and rhythmic effect have more play, whilst other effects enter which are special to instrumentation. The circumstances are such that a freedom is demanded which is incompatible with the close texture of the fugue-whether for voice or instruments, or with any structure confined to vocal range; and yet which displays unity. This problem of combining unity with the latitude invited by instrumental resources (where thus the coherence of text cannot aid) has been solved by those great modern composers who conform their expression on the principle of thematic treatment. It is really an arrangement of ideas-a curtailing all prompting which is not in spirit or in form related.

The stupidity of the music hall stage has furnished the Daily News with the theme of a slashing and amusing article in its issue of the 8th ult., and, in the correspondence provoked by this onslaught, two letters at least have been worth careful reading. In a whimsical, mock heroic fashion-betrafing, if we mistake not, the familiar hand of a well-known littérateur-the writer denounces this stupidity as immoral, and proceeds to illustrate, by copious extracts, the depressing fatuity and exquisite bathos of the music hall muse. He laments the palmy days of Evans's, and suggests, as a remedy for the existing evil, the providing of better verse for the music halls. "It ought to be easy... The management can afford to have just what it chooses to command." But in the next breath he adds that "the only hall in which good old ballads were sung by trained singers, and which resolutely excluded vulgarity from its programme, proved a dismal failure. The name of 'Paddy Green' stands like a danger signal on the path of reform." Finally he broaches the theory that the more serious life and the struggle for existence become, the more frivolous, not to say idiotic, is the mode in which people like to take their pleasure. "In proportion as the people toil hard, they seem to play foolishly, as though they put so much strength into their occupations as to leave little for their pleasures. . . . Our over-wrought artisan at the music hall is, perhaps, only a logical pendant to the overworked lawyer or man of business at the play." Altogether there is food for much reflection in this article, though we venture to assert that the writer is mistaken if he imagines the artisan to be the chief frequenter of the music hall. Philistinism chiefly flourishes among the "materialised" middle-class, according to Mr. Matthew Arnold, and the true "Arry" is removed several grades in the social scale from the working man. Not the least notable feature in the controversy provoked by this article, was the temperate and well-written retort of a "vocal comedian" from the Trocadero Music Hall. This gentleman, while admitting the inanity of much of the répertoire of the music hall singer, contended that the writer of the Daily News article had shown unfairness in the choice of his extracts, and claimed that music hall songs were at least as useful and instructive as the ordinary drawing-room ballad. He also insisted that in holding the proprietors of music halls responsible for the low level of their entertainments, the writer was putting the saddle upon the wrong horse. It was the public who really determined the character of the performance. His appeal to people to "try and see some good in music halls" is fair in so far that no one has a right to condemn them wholesale without paying them a visit. Perhaps it is an acquired taste, but we can imagine no more effectual cure for high spirits than a course of music halls, and the depression they are likely to engender. The performers mop and mow with great spirit, and sad-faced young men in the stalls applaud vigorously, but solemnly. The singers, when they do not confine themselves to spoken recitative, accompanied by the band, display a great proficiency in the arts of scooping, slurring, and squawking, and certainly a contemplation of their vocal method may serve the same purpose as the drunken Helot of old—as an awful warning what to avoid. Yet a third explanation of the present state of the music hall stage is given by another contemporary, who lays the blame at the door of the State, and insists that "it is of moment to throw open the music hall programme to operettas, the ballet d'action, and the dramatic sketch-to anything, indeed, better than the coarse and wretched ditties trolled out night after night, in the hearing of youth and inexperience, by so-called 'comiques.'" This writer goes nearer the mark than any of his fellows, and we can furnish an interesting illustration, on a smaller scale, of the value of his suggestions. Ten years ago, while any and every form of public dramatic entertainment was prohibited in intentions. No persons were likely to benefit more term time at Oxford, licenses were freely extended to music hall singers to enlighten the youth of the University by their refined and sprightly performances. Shakespeare was proscribed, while Vance might revel unchecked. This monstrous anomaly was at last removed, and the results have been so satisfactory that we have never heard of any intention on the part of the authorities to reduce the stage at Oxford to a condition which a bold parodist described as "most music hall, most melancholy."

THE renewal of the agitation in favour of lowering the Musical Pitch, which the assembling of the conference in June last and the subsequent appointment of a committee bade fair to develop into a burning question, has proved after all to be but a mere flash in the pan, and has died out abruptly on its first contact with official cold water. Sir George Macfarren has communicated to the papers the response made to the memorial presented to the commander-in-chief "requesting that the bands of the British army might have their instruments tuned to the proposed pitch, and that response briefly declares that "owing to financial and other difficulties which are too great to be overcome, his Royal Highness is unable to support the adoption of the Standard Musical Pitch, as proposed." Consequently the committee, deprived of the co-operation of the military authorities which they hold to be absolutely indispensable for the realisation of their aims, has incontinently dissolved itself. Now this identical proposition—that the co-operation of the War Office is so indispensable-has been called in question by a correspondent to one of the daily papers, who seems to imply that the dependence of orchestras upon military bandsmen is greatly exaggerated by Sir George Macfarren, adding further that these same bandsmen set so much store by their "civil" engagements that he is convinced they would find it to their interest to purchase new instruments. We should like very much to learn what the exact proportion of military performers is in the principal orchestras, for this is just a case where some precise statistics would throw a great deal of light upon the case. And we cordially agree with the hope expressed by the Times that pressure may be brought to bear upon the government, to induce them to send a representative to the conference on the Pitch question to be held at Vienna at the close of this month. It has become such a common practice of late for journals to put forward the claims of possible candidates when any vacancies occur, that we may be allowed to suggest that no fitter person could be found for the post than the Director of the Royal College of Music, especially as he has hitherto preserved a strictly impartial attitude in the matter.

THE glorious uncertainty of the law has received another conspicuous illustration, this time in the United States. It will be remembered that in the famous case of Gounod's "Redemption" American justice very properly and reasonably decided that an orchestral arrangement of a work could not lawfully be made from a pianoforte copy without consent of the proprietors. The effect of this judgment was to protect the owners of full scores from bogus creations based upon the pianoforte score, and hence no orchestral performance of "The Redemption" could take place without previous application to the proprietors of the unpublished full score. A valuable property was thus protected, and the interests of the composer were safeguarded, since his work could not be put forward under conditions almost certain to misrepresent his by this decision than Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan. Their comic operas are in great demand throughout the States; and it was naturally expected by them that if the full score-of the "Mikado," say-remained unpublished, and if a pianoforte score were prepared and copyrighted by a citizen of the United States, they would not only enjoy the advantage of publication, but also of performance with an orchestra. This state of things was, of course, regarded with intense dissatisfaction by the pirates who are always ready to rob men of the fruits of their labour or their enterprise. Undeterred by "The Redemption" case, they concocted a full score from the pianoforte copy, and calmly proceeded to give performances of the "Mikado," to the loss and injury of its proprietors. Then the question was once more referred to the law courts, the result being that judge number two upsets the decision of judge number one, and declares that there can be no property in a pianoforte arrangement, which is, therefore, open to anybody to do with as he pleases. While regretting the immediate result to the holders of important musical works, as far as the American market is concerned, it is perhaps well that the necessity for legislation, in the interests of common justice, should thus be made plain to the people of the United States. These conflicting judgments may help to fix public attention upon the whole question of international copyright with America, and thus shorten the duration of a state of things which is simply disgraceful to that country.

WE are not among those who consider themselves entitled to discuss the private doings of public people. These should be as sacred as the private doings of others, and, therefore, when a musical artist performs any act of ordinary life, it is simply impertinent for the press to make the conditions and circumstances food for everybody's gossip. It sometimes happens, however, that the artist endeavours to create capital out of these occasions, and courts for them the publicity to which, by their nature, they are not entitled. In such cases we are justified in referring to them if they can be made to point a moral. The recent marriage of Mdlle. Nevada (Miss Wixom) seems to have been conducted as an indirect advertisement. Though the actual event concerned nobody but the contracting parties, and deserved no more than a single line of record, columns were filled with descriptions of the young lady's dresses and presents, to the end of her glorification, not as a bride, but as a prima donna about to start on a tour which, presumably, would afford opportunity for seeing the creations of M. Worth in actual wear, Music suffers so much from the vanity and vagaries of that peculiar person, the prima donna, that another example is, perhaps, hardly worth noticing. Still, we cannot help asking our readers to join with us in anticipating a time when no person connected with the art of music will partly base her claims to public attention upon the magnificence of her diamonds or the splendour of her robes. We have heard of another prima donna (also American) who, when interviewed by a reporter on arriving in a place where she was to play, emptied her trunks and desired him to enlarge upon her triumphant millinery. All this may amuse, but it has a serious side, and we gravely wish that these dressy ladies would betake themselves to some other profession. Music would not miss concerted pieces by trained vocalists. This idea has, we find, recently been acted upon, and in the very best manner, in the neighbourhood of Leeds, where in a large field, admission to which was free, excellent selections from the standard Oratorios were given on a Sunday evening, in support of the local Medical Charities. The "Black Bull field," at Hunslet, was the locality in which this performance took place, and Dr. Wm. Spark, to whose article in the Leeds Saturday Journal we are indebted for this informa-tion, tells us that "the band comprised about sixty, chiefly strings-the brass and wood instruments, which were mostly wanted, being conspicuous by their absence—an omission that should be rectified on future occasions. The chorus numbered nearly four hundred, the basses, as usual in Yorkshire, being the most powerful, the altos the most penetrating. The sopranos all looked very nice, and attended earnestly to their work, but they lacked the strength we are used to in Leeds." A white sheet, we are told, was spread out for the reception of any coins which the visitors might feel disposed to give. For the chorus there was a long raised platform placed against the back of a large mill, or warehouse; the band was on the ground, or basement, and the performers stood on wooden planks, the Conductor, Mr. J. Haywood, being placed in a tolerably elevated position in front. The programme included a selection of choruses from "The Messiah," the "Creation," Mozart's 12th Mass, and two familiar pieces, "O Worship the King all glorious above," to Hanover tune, and the Old Hundredth Psalm, in which the people heartily joined. It is stated that the collection amounted to £78 os. rod; which, after deducting the necessary expenses, left a clear balance of £46 7s. 2d. to be handed over to the Hunslet Înfirmary. "Black Bull Field" has indeed earned for itself an enviable reputation; for it will unquestionably live in musical history as the spot where was initiated "Open-air Oratorio."

Some time ago we threw out a suggestion that openair music, performances of which are rapidly becoming an institution in this country, should not be confined

A CORRESPONDENT has sent us an article from a country paper, in which, speaking of the violin, the following passage occurs: "It is a pity that, under a pretence of keeping the violin a perfect instrument as to stopping the notes, its use is so limited, when, if the fingerboard were provided with frets, something like those on the guitar, so arranged as to produce notes in accord with those of a well-tuned piano, the violin would be an instrument tolerably easy to play upon. The vast proportion of those who try to learn the violin are disgusted by the horrid sounds they produce, and the difficulty of finding the right spots where to place the fingers, and they give up their task in despair." This is enclosed to us as a specimen of a provincial editor's crude notions on violin-playing; but we should like to place upon record the fact of the method here proposed having been already successfully tried. Certainly frets were not used; but a keyboard was fixed over the strings of the violin, the keys being fitted to the precise places for producing all the required notes. Being merely an apparatus to be attached to instruments, it was of course unnecessary for those who already possessed a violin to purchase a new one in order to test the value of the invention, as it could be put on and taken off the instrument without the slightest difficulty. By the aid of this "clavic attachment," as it was termed, pupils could in a very short time play tolerably diffi-cult pieces, and, it need scarcely be said, perfectly in tune, according to the system advocated by Spohr in his "Violin School," of the "uniform magnitude of all the twelve semitones." Whether there is still a to instrumental concerts, but should include solos and sale for the "attachment" we cannot say; but that it was no mere curiosity was proved by the warm interest taken in it by many of the leading executants of the time, more especially by Mr. Henry Blagrove. who, with the apparatus fitted on his violin, performed two solos at a public concert, and we, who were present on the occasion, can most decisively say with brilliant effect. The invention, so far as we can remember, was patented in 1845.

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE Fifth Triennial Musical Festival, held in the ancient capital of the West, began on the 20th ult. and ended on the 23rd. Its occurrence at a time when public attention was centred upon political men and things, and when the state of local trade had sorely limited the luxury-purchasing means of the community, encouraged no prospect of pecuniary success. Indeed, the most sanguine supporters of the enterprise, knowing the condition of things in Bristol, could only hope for a minimum of loss. Gain was expected by nobody. Under such conditions, it behoved the managers to make their programme specially attractive, as far as that could be done without adding to pecuniary risk. In this they partially succeeded. The choice of Berlioz's "Faust" was, beyond question, a wise one. It caused a genuine "run" upon the Thursday morning tickets, and produced such a good money house that, had the receipts been equally large throughout, a handsome surplus would have resulted. But the presentation of Handel's "Belshazzar" was a huge financial mistake. That it deserves to be called an artistic error also, I do not say. So fine a work is its own justification anywhere. however, the end and aim of a musical Festival, and, consequently, the test of its success, be a balance on the right side of the ledger, then, unquestionably, the committee should have resisted the blandishments of Mr. Charles Hallé, and put their foot down upon his proposal to take up "Belshazzar." It was easy to anticipate public indifference with regard to the old oratorio, spite of the fact that it had never, within living memory, been given in Bristol. Handel is a great name, no doubt, but the mass of festivalgoers are very much like sheep that follow a bell-wether. The Bristolians went to hear "Faust" because that work has recently made a noise in the world. They stayed away from "Belshazzar" because it called up no recollections, and excited no curiosity. The teaching of these facts is clear, and the committee must now see that they would have done better from a business point of view had they taken their novelties entirely from the list of works actually present to men's minds. It is not my province to mention such works by name. There are several which suggest themselves at once as certain to have made a more profitable appeal to general interest than could anything chosen from the repertory of the past. Here let me be just to the managers. They were not insensible to the importance of the consideration just stated, or they would not have requested Gounod, Verdi, and Boïto, each in turn, to write a new piece. It is fitting to acknowledge so much of enterprise. The false course began when, these applications having failed, they did not resort to a popular English composer, or take up some work around which public interest had already gathered. Concerning their further selection of "Elijah" and "The Messiah," which completed the morning concert scheme, nothing need be said. The attitude of amateurs towards their old favourites is proof that the masterpieces of Mendelssohn and Handel are still indispensable on such occasions. They drew large audiences at Bristol, not quite so numerous, perhaps, as at some former times, but this may be set down to what I am told is a really serious impoverishment of the community. Everything has dropped in Bristol but the prices of admission to the Festival.

The evening programmes were of the varied sort generally thought to be most acceptable. Yet they contained much good music. They were rich, for example, in instrumental selections, among these being Dvorák's second Symphony, and Beethoven's fifth, together with the "Oberon," "Parsifal," "Siège de Corinthe," "Tannha ser," and "Jubilee" Overtures; and two Rhapsodies who, in discharging a difficult and delicate task, shows by Svendsen and Liszt respectively. The important choral works associated with these were Brahms's "Triumphlied. C. H. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander," and the Finale to For the rest, we had the usual run of vocal solos, all very good in their way, but of which no combina-tion could possibly be worthy of a Festival occasion. Nevertheless, I am not going to bring a charge against the committee on this account. Presumably they know the taste of their public, and if their administration must be judged by figures, in accordance with the spirit of a commercial people, it is not surprising to find them sacrificing an ideal programme in favour of one adapted to attract guineas. True the guineas were not attracted in overwhelming quantities, but the fact does not prove that an ideal programme would have done any better, or even so well.

I am bound to express an opinion that the charges for admission were, considering the times now present, too high. Fifteen shillings for a seat in a limited "first division" may pass, but half-a-guinea for one in the "second division," and three half-crowns for an "un-secured," are terms needing revision. My decided conviction is, that at prices materially lower, the hall might have been filled, and the receipts increased. At any rate, two customers at five shillings are as good as—in this case, for obvious reasons, better than—one at ten, and there were times in the course of the Festival when the numbers in certain parts of the hall might have been doubled without inconvenient crowding.

The executive resources of the Festival were quite adequate. No expense was spared, for example, in getting good company of soloists, including Mesdames Albani, Williams, Patey, and Trebelli; Messrs. Lloyd, Maas, Hilton, and Santley, with two less known artists— Messrs. Piercy and Worlock-thrown in. The services of these ladies and gentlemen were not, however, given in equal proportion. Lavish use was made of Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, but Miss Williams, Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santiey, but Miss williams, Madame Patey, and Mr. Maas, each sang in only two Concerts. Against the actual work done by this department no charge whatever will lie. The solo singing was excellent throughout, and worthy of the traditions of English Festivals. For the orchestra, numbering over English Festivals. For the orchestra, numbering over ninety performers, Mr. Charles Hallé was responsible, since it comprised the whole of his Manchester band, strengthened by recruits from local sources. A very admirable orchestra it proved to be, and hardly could serious exception be taken to any of its work. The playing of Dvorák's Symphony was specially good. For the paying serious preparation had, no doubt, been made. On the other hand, Beethoven's "C minor" met with by no means the same measure of justice, though glaring faults were absent. On the whole, the orchestra maintained its reputation. So did the chorus, which Mr. D. W. Rootham had brought to a higher state of efficiency than ever. amount of care can change the natural quality of the Bristol voices, but what they lack in sonority is made up in purity of tone and general refinement. The sopranos and tenors were most admirable in all respects, but the contraltos and basses needed, I should say, an addition to their numbers for the sake of a perfect balance. Throughout the Festival, the choral singing extorted frequent praise. It was always correct, spirited, and expressive. Moreover, it bravely stood the severe test imposed by the "Triumphlied" of Brahms—a work, as amateurs know, of the most uncompromising kind, adapted equally to try skill and endurance. Through this the Bristol singers went with flying colours. Not a hitch of any kind occurred to spoil the completeness of their triumph; and on the achievement they may, for the next three years, rest their claim to consideration.

After the foregoing remarks, and considering the character of the programme, it is hardly necessary for me to go through the work of the Festival in detail. Enough, if I touch upon the more salient features in each performance, leaving the rest in an obscurity which cannot be called unjust.

"Belshazzar" led the way; occupying the place usually given to "Elijah." It was performed, as in London last year, with the additional accompaniments of Mr. E. Hecht, general prudence tempered by an occasional display of excessive rashness. The orchestration of "Ye tutelar gods," for example, reminds me more of Berlioz than Handel, and, though effective, per se, needs toning down before the whole can be accepted. The solos in "Belshazzar" were sung by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Santley, but the impression they made, even in such good hands, was as nothing to that of the choruses. These evidently surprised the The scene of the handwriting on the wall-one of Handel's grandest dramatic achievements-created a profound effect, and in the intervals of silence, the proverbial pin might have been heard to drop, so absorbed were the listeners. With regard to the efforts of the band and chorus too much cannot be said in praise. Brahms's "Triumphlied" was performed at the Evening Concert; in what manner has already been pointed out and there only remains to approve the delivery of the baritone solo by a local artist, Mr. Montague Worlock, who has a good voice and fair style. I need not detain the reader by reference to the miscellaneous selections, after due recognition of the orchestral pieces, to which ample justice was done. The "Oberon" Overture, and Syendsen's Norwegian Rhapsody in C, were among the triumphs of the band. It should be added that Mr. Lloyd introduced the tenor scena from Halévy's "La Juive," and was successful enough to warrant its retention in his repertory.

The second day's business began with "Elijah"; solos The second day's business began with "Elijah"; solos by Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Santley. Mendelssohn's work, which drew a far larger audience than did "Belshazzar," was generally well rendered, the exceptions to this rule being "For he shall give his angels" and "Cast thy burden." In the evening we had Dvorák's Symphony, the performance of which has already hear noticed. Online to the interest of the state of the st already been noticed. Owing to the interruption of late arrivals, this work occupied nearly the whole of the first hour, but it was sat out with exemplary patience by the Bristol amateurs, albeit they must have found much of it scarcely within the grasp of a first hearing. Mr. Lloyd's Worcester Cantata "Hero and Leander" followed, the solos being taken by Madame Albani and Mr. Hilton, whose voice, by the way, music written for Mr. Santley did not suit. The audience were evidently pleased with this example of the new school of English composers, and, in truth, it is a graceful creation, evincing, besides musical skill, a subtle knowledge of appropriate effects. Since the Worcester performance Mr. Lloyd has considerably enlarged the duet, with advantage to that number and the entire work, which is now not only an excellent but a completed thing. Both the music and its performance were loudly applauded, Madame Albani, as Hero, exciting positive enthusiasm; while, at the close, Mr. Lloyd bowed his acknowledgments from the President's Gallery, in answer to repeated calls. Among the more notable features in the rest of the programme were Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody, the Introduction to the third act of " Lohengrin' and the fine unaccompanied chorus, "In Praise of Music." composed by the late Dr. S. S. Wesley. This was conducted by Mr. Rootham, whose appearance called forth deserved applause.

Thursday morning witnessed the greatest success of the Festival, both as regards the public and the performers. This was due to the production of Berlioz's "Faust," the promise of which excited as much general interest as any more absolute novelty could have done, and in the result gave as much pleasure. Rarely has an unfamiliar work obtained at first hearing such unqualified approval. The audience were loud in their praises of the music and its rendering, and frank in the public and private expression of their own enjoyment. Nobody acquainted with "Faust" will marvel at this. The intensely absorbing nature of the story, and the powerful character of the music, make up a whole not to be resisted even by the least perceptive amateur. Everything possible was done to enhance its attraction, especially by placing the solos in the hands of Madame Albani, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Santley. These artists did their very best so well that on few occasions have Madame Albani's dramatic instinct, Mr. Lloyd's passionate expression, or Mr. Santley's subtle delineation of character been more conspicuously meritorious. The Briefly, the performance of "Faust" was all that could be desired, and stands forth from the mass of Festival doings as something to be remembered. In the evening, a perfunctory and spiritless rendering of Beethoven's C minor was an inauspicious beginning. But the Concert improved as it went on, though I have concert improved as it went on, though I have heard Madame Albani sing better than she did in the Finale to "Loreley." Perhaps her late arrival, which deranged the programme, disturbed the artist also. Otherwise Mendelssohn's fragment was well given. The Over-ture to "Tannhauser," the Andante and Finale from Handel's Concerto in B minor, and Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, added to the interest of the occasion, as did the overture, added to the interest of the occasion, as not the singing, by Mr. Piercy, of Sullivan's "Come, Margarita, come," and, by Mr. Santley, of the "Evening Star" song from "Tannhäuser." Mr. Hallé played two or three rather hackneyed pianoforte pieces, and was tremendously applauded, the audience seizing this special opportunity to bestow upon the Festival Conductor a personal compliment.

On Friday morning "The Messiah" was given to a full house, Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley being the principal soloists. A bare mention of the fact suffices.

It is understood that the 500 gentlemen whose names figure as guarantors in the Festival programme book will be called upon to make good a considerable deficit. They may feel sorry for the cause, but, on the other hand, will experience the satisfaction of knowing that their existence as guarantors is justified by events, and that they are not merely ornamental persons who have taken upon themselves the semblance of an obligation. I have it on the best authority that the committee are not a whit discouraged. They mean to persevere and conquer fate; in point of fact, they do not know, Englishman-like, when they are beaten. Between this time and 1888 they will no doubt take counsel together with a view to securing for the next programme a more living interest. It may easily be that the works then chosen will have no greater artistic value than those noticed above, but if their value be even slightly less, and is connected with really popular attractions, gain must result.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE welcome series of Autumn Concerts opened on Saturday, the 17th ult., with a varied and attractive programme. Symphonic composition was represented by Mr. Prout's new work, of which Mr. Manns directed a finished and spirited performance. Once or twice it seemed to us that the tempi differed slightly from those indicated by the composer at Birmingham, but these divergences, if they did exist, did not affect the unquestioned success achieved before the Crystal Palace audience, who enjoyed the advantage of an admirable and eulogistic analysis specially prepared by Sir George Grove. The bright and scholarly opening movement; the elegant but somewhat long-drawn Larghetto, with its graceful themes and admirable scoring; the piquant Intermezzo, and the spirited Finale, were all received with growing cordiality, which reached its climax when the composer came on to the platform to bow his acknowledgments. A very favourable impression was created by a débutante, Miss Fanny Davies, whose pleasant touch, intelligence, and finished execution proclaim her to be a distinct acquisition to the ranks of legitimate, as opposed to phenomenal or eccentric pianists. Besides sustaining the solo part in Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G major (No. 4)—a work notable for its magical union of majesty and grace—Miss Davies contributed pieces by Graun and Schumann. It is worthy of notice that the cadenzas introduced by the performer in the first and last movements of the Concerto are by Madame Schumann, whose pupil we understand Miss Davies to be. The solo vocalists Mdlle. Pauline Cramer, who gave a ren of the exacting recitative and aria from "Fidelio," "Absand dramatic intention than refinement or certainty of intonation, and Mr. Edward Lloyd, who sang the scena "Light, light at last!" from Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty." band and chorus were no less excellent in their way. Apart from the context, however, this number loses greatly in significance and effect, a drawback which neither the picturesqueness of the orchestration nor the fine delivery of the singer could entirely remedy. The two vocalists already mentioned took part, with Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Thorndike, in the Quintet from the "Meistersinger." Of the merits of the composition it is not our province to speak. But we may say that those who listened to it for the first time could not possibly form a fair estimate, in the face of such glaring faults of intonation as those who sustained the two upper parts were guilty of. The programme also included Cherubini's Overture to his opera of "Lodoiska"—so interesting a specimen of the composer's early efforts in the dramatic style of Gluck as to justify the disinterment of further numbers of the work—and the Introduction to the third act, Dance of Apprentices and Procession of Mastersingers, from the "Meistersinger."

The orchestral novelty of the Concert of the 24th was Mr. F. Corder's Concert Overture in E minor, entitled "Prospero." This cleverly constructed and vigorous work, " originally intended as the Prelude to a three act ballet d'action on the subject of Shakespeare's 'Tempest,'" received a remarkably fine interpretation at the hands of Mr. Manns's forces, and an unmistakably hearty greeting from the audience. There is a fine orchestral colour about Mr. Corder's composition, in which evidences of a genuine vein of melody are not wanting-witness the second subject, which is quite Mendelssohnian in its flowing melody—and it is to be hoped that the reception accorded to the Overture may induce the writer to continue and complete the entire work. After an interval of two years and a half, Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto (No. 1) was again heard at the Crystal Palace, but failed to create a very profound impression, despite the efforts of orchestra and soloist. Herr Rummel was heard, however, to great advantage in a Nocturne (Op. 17) by Chopin, and Mendelssohn's familiar Spinning Song, in which his cleanness of execution and delicacy were admirably displayed. Mr. Ben Davies made a first appearance at these Concerts in the air "Be thou faithful" ("St. Paul"). His voice, a tenor by cultivation rather than by nature, has an agreeable middle register, but lacks resonance in the upper notes. Modern Italian Opera was represented by the graceful duet from Boïto's "Mefistofele" ("Rivolgi a me"), in which Mr. Davies took part with Madame Hélène Crosmond, by the scena "L'altro notte" from the same Opera, and a Romanza ("Dubita pur") from Faccio's "Amleto," both contributed by the latter artist. Madame Crosmond's voice and method are better adapted for the bravura than the cantabile style. Her facility is considerable, but it would seem to have been gained at the expense of her organ, thereby affording a fresh illustration of the materiam superavit opus principle. The Concert opened with Berlioz's Overture to his "Benvenuto Cellini," a brilliant piece of scene painting- those who attended the Richter Concert in the evening had an interesting opportunity of comparing this work with the "Carnaval Romain" Overture, based upon themes taken from the same Operaand ended with a very fine performance of the perennial Pastoral Symphony, "the greatest piece of programme music yet composed." The unusual richness of tone displayed by the orchestra has been commented upon elsewhere, and we have great pleasure in endorsing these comments, which were fully justified by the first two performances of the season.

MR. SILAS PRATT'S CONCERT.

America already enjoys the reputation of being a musicloving country; she welcomes the most eminent European artists, pays them liberally, and supports musical performances of every kind; her native vocalists rival those of the "Old Country" on the concert platform, and even the operatic stage some of her sons and daughters have already won distinction. But in the sphere of creative art she has not as yet made any headway, possibly for want of the means at home for the thorough musical training of naturally gifted students. So far back as 1877, Mr. Silving G. Pratt paid a visit to London, and won some favourable notices for his compositions; but it was not until the Concert he gave at the Crystal Palace on the 10th, that his name came prominently before the London musical public. We are tar from questioning his boldness in devoting an entire afternoon to his own compositions; by so doing he avoided comparisons, and furthermore made the occasion one of remarkable interest to those who watch national art-developments with curiosity and hope. Mr. Pratt is, it is stated, a citizen of Chicago, and he has pursued his musical studies in Germany, though for how long a period we are unable to say. The fact, however, is indisputable that he has failed to master the laws of form. his music consisting of a number of generally original, and often beautiful ideas, following one another in no apparent order or sequence. Mr. Pratt's natural abilities are such that it is a thousand pities they have not been more carefully directed. Alike in his "Centennial Anniversary Overture," inscribed to the late General Grant, the Symphony in A, "The Prodigal Son," and in the selections from his opera "Zenobia," we find tangled skeins of melody and harmony requiring the hand of a practised musician to weave into a symmetrical and artistic musical pattern. It is in the Symphony-a very remarkable piece of programme music—that this wealth of raw material is chiefly noticeable, and its waste most to be deplored. slow movement, descriptive of the miserable meditations of the Prodigal when his substance is spent, and he is alone, sometimes approaches coherence, and the principal theme is a gem. In his orchestration, Mr. Pratt is very wild and eccentric, liberal use being made of the loudest instruments of brass and percussion. From what we have said it will be gathered that had the composer studied sufficiently he might have brought lasting credit to his country, his talents being so far above the average. It is surely not too late to repair the error. Even Schubert felt his technical deficiencies, and was about to commence taking lessons in counterpoint and fugue when he died. An agreeable feature in the Concert of the 10th ult., was the singing of an American lady, Madame Hélène Hastreiter, whose name was interpolated in the programme at the last moment. In the ballata from "Il Guarany," the débutante exhibited a rich mezzo-soprano voice, and a well-developed style. The other vocalists were Miss Griswold, Miss Lena Little, Mr. B. H. Grove, and Mr. Orlando Harley; and Mr. Manns assisted Mr. Pratt in the duties of conducting.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE conservatism of London musical audiences has its advantages and its disadvantages alike to art and artcaterers. The public is generally slow to place confidence in new enterprises, however meritorious, but once established in its favour they can sail on the flood-tide of prosperity with little or no difficulty. The natural consequence of this is an adherence to routine, and little or no seeking after novelty. The selection of the Richter programmes appears to be a particularly easy matter. Beethoven's symphonies and excerpts from Wagner's music-dramas form the regular stock-in-trade, the rest being mere padding. Some curiosity, however, may have been felt regarding the first of the autumn series of Concerts, which took place at St. James's Hall, on the 24th ult., for a rumour had gone forth that extensive changes had been made in the orchestra, for reasons which it is needless to discuss here. On comparing the lists we find that of the sixty-six strings fifteen names are new, which shows that for once rumour spoke the truth. At the same time, English players have no cause to complain, for the national element is slightly stronger than before in the band. Many of those present noticed that the tone of the strings was less pure than last season, particularly in Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, but in all other respects the performances were up to their usual level of excellence. Wagner being well represented in the first part of the programme, opportunity was found for Schumann's Symphony in D minor, a beautiful and poetical creation which is slowly working its way into popularity. The least familiar item in the first part was Berlioz's Overture "Le Carnaval Romain," founded on themes from his Opera "Benvenuto Cellini," and often performed as an entr'acte in that work. It is a wonderfully spirited piece, but despite a capital rendering it was coldly und Isolde," and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F. How many times these pieces have been heard at the Richter Concerts we are unable to say, but they appear to lose nothing of their attractiveness. The one, expressive of the most intense and agonising human passion, and the other, captivating and irresistible in its wild gaiety, appeal to the ordinary listener with perhaps more force than to the cultured musician. An encore for each was demanded, and Herr Richter had to bow many times before the audience would understand that he declined the com-

MR. WALTER BACHE'S RECITAL.

It may be an open question whether Mr. Walter Bache's deliberate propaganda for the music of Franz Liszt has succeeded in making an appreciable number of proselytes amongst art-lovers in this country. There can be no manner of doubt, however, that his enthusiastic perseverance in this cause, combined with his unquestioned ability to fill the self-elected position of a missionnaire of the most advanced school of the art, have silenced the satire by which his earlier efforts were met in some quarters, and have won for him the esteem and even the ad-miration of all earnest-minded musicians. Judging from the programme provided by the artist for the present (his sixteenth) annual Recital, which took place on the 26th ult. at St. James's Hall, he no longer considers the preponderance therein of Lisztian compositions an essential element in achieving his set purpose. Like all the adherents of his artistic creed, he traces the true progress of the development of modern pianoforte music in a straight line from Bach through Beethoven to Liszt; Chopin being allowed a share with the latter in declaring absolute the demand for a distinct poetic idea or impulse pervading modern musical utterance. Hence no inconsistency on the part of the Concert-giver is implied in the constitution of his present programme, which comprised the following selection: -Bach's Prelude and Fugue, No. 17, from Book II. of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier"; Beethoven's Fifteen Variations, with the Fugue (Op. 35); the "Chases-Neige," "Paysage," and "Feux follets," from the "Etudes d'exécution transcendante," by Liszt; ten of the Twenty-five Preludes (Op. 28), by Chopin; and three of Paganini's Caprices, arranged for pianoforte by Liszt, including that most popular one known as "La Campanella." The measure of Mr. Bache's executive powers has been so frequently taken, and his remarkable artistic earnestness and excellent taste so repeatedly dwelt upon in this journal, that we may dispense with any further comment thereon in the present instance. Suffice it to say that the artist exhibited these qualities again if anything in an enhanced degree, and that they were thoroughly appreciated by his audience, who more especially applauded his truly admirable rendering of the "Feux follets," with their distinctly Weberian complexion, from Liszt's "Etudes," and "La Campanella" from the Caprices. Nor is it necessary to add, in the case of a pianist belonging to Mr. Bache's school, that the entire programme was played without the book. The Recital was, as in previous seasons, very well attended.

HERR PEINIGER'S RECITALS.

ENCOURAGED, it would seem, by the favourable reception accorded to his violin performances last season, Herr Peiniger commenced a fresh series of three Concerts at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday, the 27th ult., on a more extensive scale, the number of performers being increased to nearly a dozen. By some mischance, however, the audience was left without any intimation of the programme. Every visitor on entering the hall was presented with a document which extolled the qualities of certain pianos, but which contained no information whatever concerning the business of the evening. This is a new departure in concertgiving, and one which cannot be commended. It is especially to be regretted on this occasion, as Herr Peiniger had been at pains to give historical interest to his scheme. He has unearthed some violin compositions by English musicians contemporary with the Italian school of Corelli and his successors, and he introduced some really inter- one, more particularly as to the choral singing, and the esting solos by George Lang, James Brooks, and Richard Jones-composers of whom our musical dictionaries say nothing-and also a Concerto for strings and harpsichord by William Corbett, a violinist of the early eighteenth century. The harpsichord part in this work and in a fine air of Purcell, "O let me weep," expressively sung by Mrs. Dyke, was played by Mr. Fuller-Maitland. Other items worthy of mention were a Tarantella of François Schubert, a Serenade of R. Volkmann (Op. 69), and a Russian Suite of Wuerst (Op. 81). The second of these instructive performances will be given on the 10th inst.

STEINWAY HALL.

THE Concert season in this building was inaugurated on Thursday, the 22nd ult., by an entertainment given under the joint auspices of Fräulein Lilli Lehmann and Herr Franz Rummel. It therefore naturally resolved itself into a combined vocal and pianoforte Recital, and the variety proved charming, the singer and the player giving equal satisfaction. Fräulein Lilli Lehmann is no stranger to the English public, her wonderfully fine impersonation of Isolde being fresh in the remembrance of those who witnessed it. She is now on her way to America, where she is engaged for the German Opera season. At the Steinway Hall her principal solo was the trying Aria from Mozart's "Die Entführung," which she rendered with much power and good execution. But she was heard to further advantage in her subsequent selections, comprising Wagner's charming little Lied "Traume," Liszt's impassioned setting of Mignon's song, and a couple of Swedish national airs. One of the latter was encored, and the artist gave it a second time with English words. Herr Franz Rummel may fairly claim a place in the front rank of living pianists. His technique is admirable, and he plays with much, and seldom exaggerated, expression, though he is not strong enough to resist the temptation to modernise the works of the old masters. Hans von Bülow's arrangement of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia is unquestionably effective, but we should like occasionally, if only for a change, to hear the work as the composer wrote it. A fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), was given, and among the miscellaneous pieces mention may be made of a charming Nocturne by the late Belgian pianist, Brassin (Op. 17).

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE long musical vacation, which succeeded to the Festival of August last, was ended on the 6th ult. by the first of the new series of Messrs. Harrison's Concerts, which attracted an overflowing audience. As usual on these occasions, the Concert was more remarkable from a personal or artistic than from a musical standpoint, executants being all of leading rank, and including Madame Adelina Patti, Miss Clara Samuell, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Frederick King, vocalists; M. Ovide Musin, solo violin; M. Lasserre, solo violoncello; and Mr. Wilhelm Ganz, solo pianist and Conductor. The instrumental items, though subordinated to the vocal attractions of the Concert, were interesting and capitally rendered, more especially Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata by Mr. Ganz, Paganini's Arpeggio Study by M. Musin, and Chopin's Paganini's Arpeggio Study by Nocturne in G by M. Lasserre,

The opening Concert of the twenty-sixth series of the Festival Choral Society, which took place on the 7th ult., was in some sense an echo of the Festival of August last, was in some sense an econ of the Festival of August last, of which it reproduced two of the leading English novelties, Dr. Bridge's "Rock of Ages" and "The three Holy Children" of Dr. Villiers Stanford. The vocal principals were Miss Annie Marriott, Mr. Winch, Mr. Brereton, Mr. Charles Goodhead, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Stimpson, as usual, was the Organist, and Mr. Stockley conducted. Owing to the magnitude of the attendance, and the unpunctuality of a section of the audience, Dr. Bridge's Motett was performed to an accompaniment of shuffling feet and rustling garments, which, for a time, interfered considerably with its effect, but the performance was nevertheless an excellent public testified their appreciation of it by hearty applause. Further acquaintance with Dr. Stanford's Oratorio tends to confirm the favourable impression which it produced at the Festival. The first part is simply admirable in its commingling of plaintive tenderness with breadth, strength, and dignity. The performance, though scarcely up to the Festival standard, was a very creditable one. Miss Marriott sang the plaintive melodies of the first part with rare sweetness and expressiveness, and in the more declamatory phrases produced an impressive effect by the vigour and earnestness of her delivery. As the Herald and the King, Mr. Watkin Mills more than sustained the promise of his Festival performance, and greatly pleased the audience by the excellent quality of his voice and the breadth of his style. Mr. Winch showed considerable fluency of execution in the lengthy and elaborate air "Blessed art Thou, O Lord God of our Fathers," and Mr. Brereton and Mr. Goodhead were effective as usual. The choral singing, though not free from reproach, was in parts very fine, the Assyrian choruses and the semi-chorus, alla Palestrina, being especially deserving of commendation. The playing of the band was somewhat unequal, though Mr. Stockley evidently did his best to ensure a perfect performance.

The Carl Rosa Opera Company paid their customary autumnal visit to Birmingham on the 12th ult., but their visit this time extended over only one week, instead of the traditional fortnight. The "Mignon" of M. Ambroise Thomas was originally announced for the opening performance, but owing to the sudden indisposition of Madame Gaylord, who was cast for the title rôle, a change became necessary almost at the eleventh hour, and Esmeralda" of Mr. Goring Thomas was somewhat hastily put on in its place. Considering all the circumstances, the performance was an exceedingly creditable and effective one, the singing and acting of Madame Georgina Burns as the heroine, and of Mr. Leslie Crotty as Quasimodo being especially praiseworthy. On the following evening, Massenet's "Manon" was produced for the first time in Birmingham, with Madame Marie Roze as the heroine, and Mr. Barton McGuckin as Des Grieux. The performance was on all hands an admirable one, and though Madame Roze was evidently not in her best voice or condition, she thoroughly captivated her audience by the archmess, spirit, and grace of her acting. On the repetition of the Opera two nights later, Madame Marie Roze was so unwell that an apology had to be made for her, but she determined to go through with her performance, and did so with excellent effect, her efforts being admirably seconded by those of Mr. McGuckin. She was unable, however, to fulfil her engagement on the Saturday night, when she was cast for the part of Susanna in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and the opera was accordingly replaced by "Mignon," in which Madame Gaylord, now thoroughly restored, sustained her original character, to the Filina of Madame Georgina Burns. The performance of "Faust," on the previous evening, when Madame Gaylord played Marguerite, introduced a new tenor of local origin, Mr. Valentine Smith.

Mr. Stockley's opening Concert on the 22nd brought together a larger audience than is customary here at performances of orchestral music, and the faith of his supporters certainly did not go unrewarded. Madame Trebelli and Mr. Arthur Rousbey were the vocalists, Mr. Rickard was the solo pianist, and the band, which comprised, as usual, a considerable metropolitan contingent, numbered eighty performers. The latter branch of the executive has now attained a strength, efficiency, and consistency which seemed scarcely possible a couple of seasons ago, but there is still room for improvement in the string department. Sullivan's "Ouvertura di ballo" furnished a light and luscious opening work, in which the spirit and unity of the band were pleasingly exemplified, but the pièce de résistance of the banquet, and the one upon which the most pains had evidently been bestowed, was Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, in the playing of which all the best qualities of the band were brought into striking relief. The ballet music, from Mackenzie's "Colomba," was charmingly played, and the gorgeous Pageant March from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," with which the Concert closed appeared Rickard's playing of the pianoforte part of the last two nurtured amid refining influences will, naturally, grow up movements of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat was a masterly effort, the admirable technique of the performer being supplemented by genuine musical intelligence and poetical feeling. In Liszt's extraordinary rhapsody, "Venezia e Napoli," the executant was not wanting either in power or lightness and articulateness of touch, and his performance evoked the most enthusiastic manifestations of approval from the audience.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

CHIEF among our musical doings during October must be reckoned the visit of Mr. F. H. Cowen, as distributor of the certificates awarded by the Society of Professional

Last year the Society invited the assistance of the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley, Bart., who delivered a very interesting address on the English School of Music. Having thus paid respect to one of our most distinguished representatives of organ and church music, the Society desired the presence of an equally eminent orchestral writer, and selected one who in his recent works has displayed the highest qualifications. On Tuesday, the 20th ult., the candidates who passed in Liverpool, Southport, and the neighbourhood assembled in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, under the presidency of the Bishop, who expressed his sincere gratification at the great success of the Society and his earnest desire to aid any efforts to improve the culture and forward the diffusion of music. A short selection of songs and piano pieces, together with one violin solo, were well performed, and showed the skill attained by the more advanced students. In the evening Mr. Cowen and several musicians were entertained by the Liverpool Musical Club, Dr. Crowe, the Vice-President of the club, being in the

On the following afternoon the Mayor of Manchester (Alderman J. J. Harwood) threw open the large concertroom and his parlour in the Town Hall, and presided over a very crowded meeting. In his opening remarks the Mayor spoke warmly of the effect of music in elevating and refining the masses of the people, and drawing them nearer to all that is pure and good and holy. The Manchester students played and sang in a manner reflecting the highest credit upon their teachers, and several of them

At both meetings Mr. Cowen delivered an address on the present condition and the prospects of music in England; speaking of the rapid strides recently made in its dissemination and culture, of the necessity for encouraging a high tone of musical thought, of the want, among young students especially, of more friendly and frequent intercourse with their teachers and with others qualified to guide their taste, of the advantages which all associations of musicians may offer in surrounding the younger disciples by an atmosphere of artistic influence and advice, and of the great discouragements and drawbacks of isolated students, Mr. Cowen said, "It is a national disgrace that, in the richest and most prosperous country in the world, the cultivation and growth of music should be left to private enterprise and generosity, and that of the more than six hundred members of our legislative assembly not one has yet been found to plead our cause. To the members of this Society I would say, form yourselves into little armies, make musical centres for yourselves, endeavouring to impart your knowledge, and the result of your labours in places which-though perhaps containing wealth and every commercial advantage-have as yet little or no musical life; form your own orchestras, even your own schools, so that eventually the cities of your adoption may vie with others at present more fortunate. And to those who pursue the art as a means of recreation, I would say that, although genuine love of, and enthusiasm for, music do undoubtedly exist to an extent in this country, still they are not universal. The serious appreciation of our art is yet far from being all one could wish. The same discrimination should be used with respect to music as is exercised by intelligent and cultivated people with regard to poetry, literature, and the other fine arts. A child bearing traces of its early surroundings; and if those surroundings be maintained, the influence will increase through successive generations until it becomes inborn and instinctive. So it is with music; and the household which shuns all that is unrefined, or which sinks below the level of art, in the widest and most liberal acceptance of the term, must make its influence felt, and that influence must spread with everincreasing strength throughout the generations to come."

From the report issued, some portions of which were read by Mr. Chadfield, it appeared that, in their second year, the Society's examinations have, in the Manchester centre, proved more attractive than any of the longer established inspections; and that a greatly enlarged edition of the examination book (which forms an essential feature of the system) is now being printed.

At the banquet at the Victoria Hotel, which was given after the meeting, the Mayor referred to some observations made by Dr. Hiles at the afternoon gathering, to the effect that, in a country like England, wherein the local government has for ages played such an important part, and in which the municipal authorities are invested, at least in principle, with almost all the responsibilities of government, it is strange that, being compelled to tax the people for educational purposes, our corporations should have no direct control over, or power of interference with, education. In the course of his speech his worship said that as regards assistance from Government or from local authorities, he thought the matter was within the grasp of his hearers. The difficulty was not any unwillingness on the part of the authorities, but the want of a thoroughly practical scheme. He believed that any purely unselfish plan, evidently in the interests of musical art, would be heartily received. In the immediate future there will be a large extension of local self-government-that means extension of education in every direction-music, painting, sculpture, and everything else; because every one is awake to the importance of the dissemination of knowledge, as essential to the development of the higher and nobler aspirations of the people. Dr. Hiles afterwards referred to the Mayor's words as the most hopeful that he had heard for a long time.

At St. James's Hall an Exhibition of musical instruments has been opened for some weeks, and organ, piano, and vocal performances have been given by Mr. H. Stevens, Mus. B., Mr. H. Hawkins, Miss St. Claire, Mr. J. P. Shaw, Dr. Allison, Mr. Wrigley, Mr. Clegg, Miss Fanny Atkinson, Miss Slater, and many other young candidates for public Large audiences have also assembled to listen to competitions of choirs of all sizes and kinds.

The Gentlemen's Concerts commenced with a well attended Recital by Mr. Hallé, followed on the 26th by an orchestral Concert, with Mr. E. Lloyd as vocalist. Svend-sen's Symphony in B flat (No. 2), and the Andantino and Gavotte from Lachner's Suite (No. 6), in C, were included in the programme.

Mr. de Jong opened his campaign on Saturday, the roth ult., with a large party of vocalists, including Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, and Signor Foli, and with his orchestra of sixty performers. The overtures (including "Der Freischütz") and selections were played with spirit, although with some lack of finish, which probably will disappear as the season progresses. The strings require strengthening, or the brass subduing. At the second Concert (on the 24th) Miss Griswold, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Signori Papini and Bottesini, and others assisted Mr. de Jong in filling the house.

The two sections of the Vocal Society—respectively under the direction of Mr. Henry Watson and Mr. Towers —have appeared in public. Mr. Watson's corps—which appeared to include more of the older members of the choir of the late Mr. Henry Wilson-sang with refinement and Mr. Towers' pupils scarcely displayed so much experience and judgment, although the selection of the choral numbers was very prudently made.

And, finally, Mr. Hallé's own Subscription Concerts commenced on the 29th—too late for any remark, except that few changes have been made in the band (which includes 100 performers), that Madame Albani was selected as the vocal attraction, that Dvorák's "Legende" for orchestra was announced, for the first time here, and that the subscription list is as remunerative as ever.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

WE have now to chronicle the opening events of our ensuing season 1885-6, the Philharmonic Society, as usual, leading the van. It is, however, somewhat unfortunate that its first performance, which took place on September 29, was scarcely of the high standard which one naturally expects from our leading Society, or such as to give a favourable augury of their work for the coming. season. These remarks are mainly attributable to the lack of success generally evidenced in the vocal department; but as regards the orchestral items, whilst all novelties were carefully eliminated from the programme, their performance by Mr. Halle's unimpeachable band was beyond question or cavil. The Concert opened with a rendering of Benedict's bright and martial overture "The Crusaders," and its selection was a fitting tribute to the memory of the venerable knight whose bâton held sway over the forces at the Philharmonic Hall for so lengthy a period. The other items of chief importance were Mendelssohn's D minor Pianoforte Concerto, and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8. In the former Mr. Halle's clear touch and artistic skill were as welcome as ever, and the Symphony received every attention at the hands of the orchestra. Written in a somewhat more frolicsome humour than was Beethoven's wont, the variations and changes of theme amongst the instruments is quite refreshing, and the whole work is a fine example of the great master's versatility

At the second Concert of the above Society the Symphony performed was Haydn in C, bearing the somewhat singular title "L'Ours," and its rendering furnished as true an interpretation of the character of the work as could be The other performances by the band included the desired. fourth of Beethoven's Overtures to "Fidelio," the Overture to Weber's "Jubilee" Cantata, and the Hungarian March from Berlioz's "Faust." Madame Norman-Néruda appeared at this Concert, and by her skilful exposition of Max Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor still further enhanced the reputation of a work which has been heard with advantage already several times in Liverpool. would almost seem superfluous to pay a similar compliment to the fair executant, but such testimony is fully warranted by the increasing power and expressive earnestness which this, and the subsequent performance of an excerpt in D minor from a Mozart Sonata, and other selections, evidenced. Mr. Edward Lloyd was the vocalist, and gave in his usual finished style the Prize Song from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the aria from Halévy's "Jewess"-"Oh, Rachel, oh, my daughter!"—and the song from Frederick Clay's Cantata "Lalla Rookh"—"I'll sing thee songs of Araby." The work allotted to the chorus was unimportant, but the part-songs set down were rendered with care and taste. The "Creation" will be given at the next Concert of the Society, on the 3rd inst., the artists being Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Ludwig.

Mr. Hallé's series of orchestral performances commenced in the Philharmonic Hall on the 27th ult., and will be more fully referred to in our next issue. The fact that Madame Albani has been engaged for the first Concert, with Mr. Charles Hallé as solo pianist, is a sufficient indication that the old standard of quality and efficiency will be fully maintained. The orchestra has again been augmented to upwards of 100 performers, and we understand that the booking of seats for the series has more than justified this

The Waterloo Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. W. Appleyard, has resumed rehearsals, and, with commendable spirit, proposes to introduce to this neighbourhood one at least of the new works which first saw the light at the Birmingham Festival—viz., Dr. Stanford's Cantata "The Three Holy Children." The prospective programme also includes Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis

The eighth annual distribution of prizes in connection with the examinations of Trinity College, London, which was held in St. George's Hall, on the 10th ult., revealed a very satisfactory state of affairs, and demonstrated the foremost place which Liverpool still holds in the list of successful centres, having passed a total of 456 students during the past twelve months, of whom eighty-four gained

THE TIMES.

THE TIMES.

"It may be briefly recapitulated that the work consists of four parts —a short prologue, a Requiem Mass, the Last Judgment,' and the Celestial Jerusalem.' In the prologue, which is sustained by the chorus and baritone solo, the keynote, or rather one of the keynotes of the conception, that of becoming sequence of three major seconds of the conception, the conception of
STANDARD.

"In the Quartet 'Quid sum, miser,' the chief subject, allotted to the tenor, in G minor, is repeated by the contralto on the dominant, and again in its original position by the soprano; the bass solo then interrupts with the 'Rex tremends,' which, after a somewhat stern opening, merges into a charming and passionate melody for all four voices, redolent of the master's happiest manner from first to last. The 'Salve me' episode is both beautiful and poetical, the voice parts being admirably distributed, though a considerable tax is laid upon the powers of the soprano. Altogether, the 'Quid sum' takes high rank amongst the good things which the author provides in 'Mors et Vita.' . . The verse, 'Sed signifer Sanctus Michael,' sung by the soprano to a delicate accompaniment of wood-wind and violins, pulsating in triplets, while an occasional chord from the harp and the least suspicion of a touch on the cymbals gives colour and accentuation to the music. This is another of M. Gounod's little triumphs. . . . The truth of the context which is entitled 'The Motive of Happiness,' whose 'linked sweetness' extends to fifteen bars. No attempt is made to develop this, but in its concentrated form it is so fascinating that probably any alteration would be a disfigurement. . . By way of Epilogue comes an interfude written for full orchestra, with the addition of the context the grant (Sanchalton and Joy, and Terror and Anguish. Thus an imposing and majestic, as well as significant, peroration is attained, and the chief division of the trilogy ends forcibly, as it began. . . The exquisite and prolonged theme which first prefaces and afterwards accompanies the chorus, 'Sedenti in Throno,' is unquestionably the most inspired of the trilogy."

"The new Oratorio is technically and æsthetically a success, though, perhaps, more so in the latter sense than in the former. It cannot be heard without emotion; or without a sense, at the end, that the spirit of the hearer has been raised to higher than earthly things, while his artistic imagination has been excited and his bodily sense gratified. These results I take as assured signs that the composer's mark has been fully hit. . . . 'Mors et Vita' impresses—I was about to write awes. The outcome of deep feeling, its music surrounds the hearer with a religious atmosphere, from the influence of which there is no exape. In other words, this Oratorio Idilis the highest function of a work of art, which is to place the observer on the same level, and or rapport with itself." "The new Oratorio is technically and æsthetically a success, though

DAILY NEWS.

"In this, as in M. Gounod's earlier Oratorio, are apparent a deep and earnest religious feeling: a power of expressing both the awful and the beautiful aspects of Divine wrath, its justice and mercy, and an individuality of atyle and treatment which impress both works as an individuality of atyle and treatment which impress both works as they could have proceeded. As in 'The Redemption,' so in 'Mors et Vita,' orchestral colouring is a pervading and important feature throughout; the recurrence of the representative themes already specified giving a unity to the latter work. The instrumentation in 'Mors et Vita' is in many cases similar to that of 'The Redemption,' and other works of the composer. This, however, does not imply mannerism, but merely such distinctive individuality of style as is to be found in all masters and authors who have risen above the common herd of mere imitators. This M, Gounod assuredly has done, not only in operas, but notably in his two great Oratorios, of which 'Mors et Vita' is the later and grander example."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"'Mors et Vita' is worthy of M. Gounod at his very best, . . . In any estimate of Gounod's finer works henceforward made, 'Mors et Vita' may be mentioned in the same breath with 'The Redemption,' the 'Messe Solennelle,' 'Faust,' and 'Mireille,' The individual asking for higher credentials of the merit of the new Oratorio produced this morning must be difficult to satisfy. Of the eventual popularity of the work I have no doubt—indeed, it is quite likely to be a couple of years hence, a greater favourite than 'The Redemption.'"

WEEKLY DISPATCH

honours. The prizes were distributed by the Mayoress of Liverpool, and his worship the Mayor presided.

Another interesting ceremony, somewhat analogous to the above, took place in the same building on the afternoon of the 20th ult., when the annual distribution of certificates in connection with the Society of Professional Musicians was held under the presidency of the Bishop of Liverpool. The Society is a most useful and practical one, deserving of every countenance and support, and the occasion was utilised to bring down Mr. F. H. Cowen to Liverpool, who, in addition to distributing the prizes to the successful candidates, made some valuable remarks as to the development of music and musical instincts in England.

The Harvest Festivals which have recently been celebrated at a number of our most prominent Churches have, in many cases, been of considerable interest from a musical point of view. The Services at St. Agnes's, Sefton Park, on the 22nd and 25th ult., were accompanied by a full orchestra, and comprised performances of Handel's Halle-lujah Chorus, Mozart's Twelfth Mass, and Lowe's Harvest Anthem "The earth is the Lord's." Evening Service in A, by the Organist, Mr. I. H. Stammers, was also produced for the first time, and evidenced more than ordinary ability on the part of the talented young

MUSIC IN THE WEST.

THE 34th Concert of the Bristol Musical Association was given in Colston Hall, Bristol, on the 24th ult., before a very large audience. The chief work performed was Haydn's Imperial Mass, which was fairly rendered under the Conductorship of Mr. George Gordon, to whom great credit is due for the energetic and resolute way in which these Concerts are carried on. The remainder of the programme was miscellaneous, two organ solos being contri-buted by Mr. George Riseley. The vocalists were Miss Julia Jones, Madame Pennington, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. W. Thomas.

The Colston Hall Organ Recitals have again been resumed for the season, the first being given on the 3rd ult., when Mr. George Riseley displayed his brilliant execution and complete mastery of his instrument to a large and enthusiastic audience. The second Recital was given on the 10th ult., when a most interesting selection of music was performed.

The opening service in connection with the new organ at Christ Church, Clifton, was held on the 8th ult. There was a crowded congregation, and the choir was largely augmented for the occasion. Mr. Riseley presided at the organ, and gave a Recital at the conclusion of the service. The next day Mr. C. H. Lloyd, Organist of Christ Church, Oxford, gave two Recitals at the same place, both of which were largely attended. Mr. Lloyd played a fine selection of music, and his artistic interpretation was evidently greatly appreciated.

On the 10th ult. a very interesting Invitation Concert was given in the smaller of the Victoria Rooms, by Miss Mary Lock, R.A.M. Miss Lock was assisted by Mr. Arthur Hudson (violin) and Mr. Edward Pavey (violoncello), and the programme included Bennett's Trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, and Raff's Trio in G, Op. 112, for the same instruments, both of which works were admirably performed. Mr. Hudson and Mr. Pavey each contributed a solo, and Mrs. Robert George gave three songs in a pleasing manner. Miss Lock contributed three solos, selecting Sonata in F sharp, Op. 78 (Beethoven), Arabesque (Schumann), and the Fourth Tarantella of Walter Macfarren. In her rendering of all these, but more especially in the Sonata, she showed herself to be a pianist of a high order, her delicate fingering and refined expression being very striking. Miss Lock studied for three years under Mr. Walter Macfarren, and is certainly a great credit to her master.

Miss Aylward gave her second Chamber Concert of the present season at the Assembly Rooms, Salisbury, on September 23. Miss Aylward was associated with Mr. Burnet (violin) and Mr. Whitehouse (violoncello). The programme included Schubert's Trio in B flat (Op. 99), Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor (Op. 49), Bennett's more than two years ago Herr Christensen came, for the Sonata for piano and cello in A (Op. 32), and a violin solo, Andante and Rondo (Viotti). Miss Aylward played Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor (Op. 31), which was encored. The third Concert took place on the 21st ult., the programme being of a popular character. The vocalists were Miss Amy Aylward, Miss Spencer Jones (in place of Miss Hilda Wilson, absent through indisposition), Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike. Pianoforte, Miss Aylward and Mr. South, the Cathedral Organist. The programme included Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Duet in A, and Schumann's Andante and Variations in B flat for two pianofortes, both of which were heartily and deservedly applauded.

The second Concert for the year of the Exeter Orchestral Society was held in the Public Rooms, Exeter, on September 26. There was a good attendance, and the performance showed steady progress on the part of the members. Among the most noteworthy items of the programme were two movements from Gade's Novelletten for string orchestra, a very graceful and elegant Minuet by Mr. W. Baly, A.R.A.M. (performed for the first time); the Adagio, Minuet, and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in C, and the Andante from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. Mr. Bayman, of the Plymouth Marine Band, played in excellent style an effective bassoon solo, and the Madrigal Society sang (unaccompanied) a charming part-song, "Sweet and low," by their late Conductor, Baly, and (with orchestra) Schumann's "Gipsy Mr. W. Baly, and (with orchestra) Schumann's "Gipsy life." The latter would have benefited by more rehearsal. Mr. R. B. Moore, F.C.O., conducted with much tact and judgment.

Mr. Farley Sinkins's Morning and Evening Concerts, the first of the season, were held in the Victoria Hall, Exeter, on the 16th ult. The artists engaged were Miss Gertrude Griswold, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Maybrick, Signor Guido Papini, Signor Bottesini, and Miss Agnes Zimmermann, with Mr. Sidney Naylor as Conductor.

The Oratorio Society has in preparation for the Christmas Concert, Haydn's "Creation." We are sorry to hear that the finances of this Society are in a very unsatisfactory condition, and earnestly hope that the musical public of Exeter will come forward, and, by increasing the number of subscribers, relieve the managers of their difficulty, and accord to the Society, almost the oldest of its kind in the kingdom, the support it so well deserves.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

YORKSHIRE has not been behind in the great musical awakening. Already most of the Societies have either renewed acquaintance with the public or are eagerly preparing to do so. The season promises to be exceptionally fruitful of chamber music, which is extending its claims upon public appreciation not only in Leeds and Bradford, but in Huddersfield, Halifax, and other populous centres of the West Riding.

In Leeds, Mr. Edgar Haddock's Musical Evenings, which are to be given weekly all through the season, have already won the sympathy of a large section of the public. Mr. Haddock's capabilities as a violinist have gained him much respect, and he has secured the co-operation of a pianist, who, though young, is fit company for so experienced an artist. Mr. Haddock and Mr. Fred. Dawson will have given four Concerts when these remarks are published, and every one of them deserves favourable mention. Each programme contains a Sonata for pianoforte and violin, a solo for each instrument, and a duet for the two instruments. Almost all styles of composition, and, in particular, many works entirely unknown to Yorkshire audiences, if not to most musical assemblies in England, have been drawn upon for performance, the aim being to present examples of great masterpieces for both instruments. Thus far the scheme has been highly successful.

Herr Christensen, a facile pianist and an artist of considerable musical culture, opened a series of Chamber Concerts, in the Albert Hall, Leeds, on the 13th ult. Little first time, to Leeds, and although an entire stranger he has succeeded in making many friends. For his first Concert he had the co-operation of Miss Emily Shinner, a young violinist whose first appearance in Leeds was regarded with considerable interest. Although suffering from a weakened wrist she gave proof of those promising qualities which have attracted much favourable comment. For solo Christensen she joined in the rendering of Beethoven's Christensen she joined in the rendering of Beethoven's well-known Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 1), and a Sonata for piano and violin by a Danish composer, Van Eyken—a novelty which met with a very cordial welcome—and Joachim's three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2, and 5, arranged for piano and violin. Van Eyken's work is a prize composition written for competition under the auspices of the Netherlands Art Society. It bears traces of the influence of Mendelssohn and is bright and melodious, and withal excellently constructed. Herr Christensen's solos included compositions by Neupert and Moszkowski, and three Studies from his own pen, which served to prove that he possesses no little talent as a creative musician. His solos were warmly received. The vocalist was Mr. Charles Blagbro', a tenor with much refinement of style and a voice of exceptional melodic beauty. The Leeds Popular Concerts were resumed on the 21st ult. in the Coliseum. There was a large attendance, but the building was far from full. It must not be supposed that the large proportion of empty seats implied lack of sympathy on the part of the public with Mr. Ford's venture, for the Coliseum will hold 4,000 people, and it would indeed be an extraordinary occasion that would bring together so vast an audience. For a Chamber Concert it is not the most comfortable building one could wish to enter, and it is just possible that the building itself had something to do with the want of enthusiasm which was apparent during the progress of the Concert. Certain it is that no greater attraction could have been provided in the region of high art than that which Mr. Ford put before his patrons. It is seldom even in the atmosphere of the West Riding, which is so thoroughly imbued with the love of music, that one has the opportunity of hearing a finer performance of a work of such serious import as Brahms's Sextet in B flat. The rendering was characterised by great finish; but, perhaps, less warmth and enthusiasm than one would have expected from such a combination of artists. Fragments of an unfinished String Quartet, by Mendelssohn-an Andante and Scherzo-were, however, more to the taste of the audience, coming as they did in pleasant contrast to the somewhat coming as they did in pleasant contrast to the somewhat severe exercise of intellect demanded by Brahms. Spohr's Double Quartet in E minor (Op. 87), brought together a fine array of instrumentalists—viz., Messrs. Holmes, Parker, Gibson, and Howell; Messrs. Burnett, Grimson, Roberts, and Charles Ould. Another interesting feature was Schumann's "Märchenbilder," a duet for piano and viola, in the performance of which Mr. Alfred Broughton and Mr. A. Gibson were associated with pleasant results. The only solo of the evening was that of Mr. Holmes, who selected Ernst's beautiful "Elégie," and was rewarded for his thoroughly intellectual and finished performance by a vociferous recall. Herr Hens-chel's singing aroused something like a sensation. His rich bass voice had ample opportunity for display in the rendering of Handel's "Rendi il Sereno," a drinking song by Brahms, and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." He shows a dramatic fire, and a facility of expression seldom equalled by the singers who visit us. It should be added that the Sextet and the Mendelssohnian fragments were

An unusually early performance of "The Messiah" was given at the Denison Hall, Armley, on the 19th ult., in aid of the funds of the Leeds General Infirmary. Mr. Cawthra was the Conductor, and the principals were Miss Lupton, Miss Greenwood, Mr. Wadsworth, and Mr. Morton. The chorus was efficient, though perhaps too uniformly vigorous. The result was in every sense of the term gratifying to the solos were rendered efficiently by Miss H. Tomlinson, Mrs. Trenam, Mr. Charles Blagbro', and Mr. H. Rickard. Mr. James Calvert conducted.

The Idle Harmonic Union gave its second Subscription Concert on the 20th ult., in St. John's Schools, when the performance of the "Elijah" drew together a large audi-

Among the first to resume the musical gatherings in Bradford has been Mr. Edward Misdale, who opened his series of Chamber Concerts in the Church Institute, on the rath ult. The list of subscribers to this excellent and unpretentious course has grown to very respectable dimensions since last season, and Mr. Misdale repays the confidence of the public in a liberal, though unostentatious spirit. His opening Concert was a pleasant specimen of its kind—instructive and interesting as it was artistic. Amid works which hold high places in the region of constructive art, Mr. Misdale generally contrives to introduce an element of novelty, and, as belonging to this category-although one of them was not absolutely unknown in Bradford-the interest of the audience was chiefly divided between Dvorák's Trio in B flat (Op. 21) and Goetz's Trio in G minor (Op. 1). Dvorák's work proved not nearly so difficult of approach as some of the Bohemian's later productions, and Goetz's Trio, fanciful and radiant in colour, though apparently wanting something in traditional form, was followed intelligently. Mr. Misdale's companions in the performance of these works were Herr Otto Bernhardt (violin) and Mr. G. F. Collinson (violoncello). Mr. Misdale selected, for his pianoforte solo, Raff's Suite in E minor (Op. 72), which was rendered with as much feeling and refinement as technical accuracy. David's Violin Solo, Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso, provided Herr Bernhardt with a congenial task, and Mr. Collinson had an equally pleasant duty in the rendering of Piatti's "Chant Religieux" and a Mazurka by Popper. The vocal element of the Concert was supplied by Mrs. Ashcroft-Clarke, whose accomplished singing was equalled by her good taste.

The second of the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts was given on the 21st ult. The programme was devoted chiefly to works which belong to the sphere of high art, and the list of artists was a distinguished one. these Concerts have been given in connection with a literary scheme known as the Highfield Lectures. Under its new title, literary as well as musical entertainments will still be provided, and as almost a thousand season tickets have been disposed of, success is assured. The undertaking is under the able management of Mr. John Wilkinson. The Concert under notice opened with one of Haydn's charming compositions, the String Quartet in F, No. 2, Op. 77, which Mr. Holmes's quartet party (Mr. Holmes, Mr. Parker, Mr. Gibson, and Mr. Howell) contributed. This, with two fragments of an unfinished Quartet by Mendelssohn, belonging to that master's posthumous works, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet, constituted an agreeable programme, admirably adapted to the taste of a popular audience. In the Quintet, Miss Nelly Marshall, a young débutante, who has just completed her studies at the Royal College of Music, supplied the pianoforte part. Miss Marshall acquitted herself with skill not only in this capacity, but in the rendering of two morceaux title, literary as well as musical entertainments will still be only in this capacity, but in the rendering of two morceaux —a Nocturne, by Franz Seideritz, and a Tarantella, by Moszkowski. The remainder of the performances were a violoncello solo, Marcello's Sonata in G minor (Mr. Howell), and Spohr's Salonstück in E flat (Mr. Holmes), and, in addition, two admirably executed songs, Spohr's "Rose softly blooming" and Gounod's "O that we two were maying." Mr. J. F. Marshall officiated as accompanist. Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" formed the subject of an interesting Concert given by the Horton Lane Chapel Choir, on the 22nd ult. The effortwas, on the whole, highly creditable. The principals were Miss Marshall and Mr. Arthur Broughton. Mr. A. Gledhill conducted the performance.

A PUBLIC meeting of the guarantors, and others interested in the Annual Concert scheme of the Glasgow Choral Union, was held on the 21st ult., when a detailed and complete prospectus of the arrangements for the ensuing ence. The chorus were pretty evenly balanced, and the season was submitted. Much satisfaction was expressed with the choice of music, choral and orchestral, and specially with Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," not only on account of the great genius which it is known marks the composition; but also, and very naturally, from the fact that its author is a native of Scotland. The production of Dvorák's new Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride." is also looked forward to with much interest. As I mentioned in my last letter, four choral Concerts in all are to be given, the other works being Handel's "Messiah" and Costa's "Eli." The chief orchestral selections to be performed are as follows:-Symphonies: Beethoven, the "Eroica," and No. 7 in A; Dvorák, No. 2, in D minor; Haydn, in E flat, No. 4 of Rieter-Biedermann's Edition; Mazart, in G minor; Prout, No. 3, in F; Raff, "Im Walde"; Schubert, No. 10, in C; Schumann, No. 3, in E flat, "Im Walde"; Schubert, No. 10, in C; Schumann, No. 3, in E flat, "Rhenish"; five of these to be performed for the first time here. Concertos: Beethoven, No. 4, in G (piano), in D (violin); No. 3, in C minor (piano); No. 5, in E flat D (violin); No. 3, in C minor (piano); No. 5, in E flat (piano); Mendelssohn, in E minor (violin); Rubinstein, No. 4, in D minor (piano); Wieniwaski, No. 2, in D (violin); the last two for the first time here. Overtures: Beethoven, "Leonora," No. 2; Bennett, "Wood Nymph"; Berlioz, "King Lear"; Brahms, "Academical Festival"; Gorder, "Frospero"; Gluck, "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Macfarren, "Festival"; Mendelssohn, "Athalie"; Meyerbeer, "Struensee"; Rossini, "William Tell"; Schubert, "Overture in the Italian style"; Schumann, "Manfred"; Wagner, "Tannhäuser"; Weber, "Oberon"; four of these for the first time. Among the miscellaneous may be mentioned, in detail, two movements from I. S. Bach's Conthe first time. Among the miscellaneous may be men-tioned, in detail, two movements from J. S. Bach's Con-certo, No. 4, in G; Romance from J. F. Barnett's "Lady Margaret and the Knight," and Scherzo, from the same composer's "Lay of the Last Minstel"; two instrumental movements from Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty"; introduction and ballet airs from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba"; orchestral interlude, "Salve Polonia," from Liszt's "Stanislaus"; selections from Rubinstein's suite, "Bal Costume"; and from ballet airs in Saint-Saëns's "Etienne Marcel"; also, Schubert's "Deutsche Tanze"; all these to be performed for the first time in Glasgow. Four excerpts from Wagner, and a morceau each from Mendelssohn and Sullivan, all more or less familiar, complete the list of the miscellaneous selections. It seems to be felt that a more judiciously compiled orchestral list has been seldom, if ever, submitted to the Glasgow public. The orchestra will number eighty-five performers, and will this year be led by Herr M. Sons, Concertmeister of Schaffhausen. As stated before, Mr. Manns will conduct. In addition to the names of the vocal artists mentioned last month as engaged for the choral works and as soloists on the orchestral nights are the following: Miss Thudichum, Miss Bertha Moore, Mdlle. Elly Warnots, Miss Amy Sherwin, Miss Alice Heale, Madame M. Mackenzie, Mr. W. Winch, and Mr. John Bridson; and as instrumental soloists, Herr M. Sons, violin; and Miss Fanny

Davies, piano.

The Concerts begin on Tuesday evening, December 8, with a performance of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," to be conducted by the composer.

The Glasgow Select Choir gave its first Concert in the city on the 7th ult., in St. Andrew's Hall, and before a very large audience. Mr. J. Millar Craig made his first public appearance as Conductor since his appointment to that post, in the room of the late Mr. Allan. All the choral music was sung with the grace and vigour which mark the choir's performances.

Organ Recitals were given on the 13th ult. in Camphill United Presbyterian Church, by Mr. W. Schofield; on the same evening in St. Mary's Established Church, by Mr. G. W. Hopper, and on the 22nd in Queen's Park Established Church, by Mr. S. Fraser, the latter Recital with "vocal intermezzi."

The West of Scotland Branch of the Tonic Sol-fa College, which has now been established here on a firm basis, has issued its first prospectus of music classes.

Two Concerts were given by Mr. George Taggart's Male Voice Choir, one in the new Waterloo Rooms, on the 13th, and the other in the National Halls, on the 17th ult. The programmes were of similar character, that is to say, they consisted chiefly of German part music for male voices, including Mendelssohn's "To the sons of Art." Mr. Taggart has brought together a highly promising amateur choir, which, with a little further experience, may attain to the degree of perfection aimed at, and may meet with the recognition on the part of the musical public that it deserves. In the meantime it is rather uphill work to create a taste here for male voice music.

A Lecture was given in Hillhead Academy on the 15th ult., by Mr. James Merrylees, of the Tonic Sol-fa College, Glasgow Branch, on voice development, the chair being taken by Professor McKendrick, who is our chief authority here on the Science of Sounds, and other similar subjects closely related to the study of the musical art. The Lecture was illustrated by the singing of a quartet party, and was well received.

The Uddingston Musical Association, to the vacant conductorship of which Mr. George Taggart has been appointed, will study Farmer's Massin B flat for their leading Concert during the season.

The Glasgow Temperance Choral Society, a condition of membership in which is total abstinence from alcoholic liquors, and which is now in its third session, and apparently flourishing, is to practise Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," and some choruses from Wagner, &c. Mr. J. Bell, of the Sol-fa College, is the Conductor.

A Choral Society, numbering thirty of the best voices in the neighbourhood, has been formed in Kilsyth, a few miles north-east from Glasgow, under the conductorship of Mr. T. Sweeney. Part-songs, glees, &c., are to be practised, and a Concert will probably be given in December.

The Musical Association connected with East United Presbyterian Church, Johnstone, near Glasgow, and which is conducted by Mr. John S. Allan, Organist of the Church, are practising Parker's Cantata "Silvia." There are about forty members in the Society.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda gave a Concert in Paisley, on the 6th ult., in the Clark Hall.

New York, October 10.

THE twenty-eighth annual Festival of the Worcester County (Massachusetts) Musical Association took place, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, the Conductor of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, from September 22-25, and goes on the records as the finest achievement, artistically, that the enterprising Association has placed to its credit, and also as a complete financial success, the receipts having exceeded the expenditure by a handsome sum, notwithstanding that the board of government were quite liberal in their outlay of money. From the point of view occupied by a utilitarian in art, the Worcester Festivals are open to a serious question. The Association is now a homogeneous organisation, the singing members of which for the greater part live in Worcester. There would, therefore, seem to be no reason why it should not be an active factor in every effort to advance music in Worcester. Yet it confines itself to giving an annual Festival, in which the choral features are by no means of the importance and dignity which might fairly be expected. must be remembered that this is not an association of choirs from various cities, but a single, compact, well-governed choir, the members of which not only contribute their services at the Festivals without money reward, but pay an annual fee for the privilege of study. To confine the public activity of such a choir (it numbers 500 voices) to a single week in each year seems a mistake from every point of view, except that occupied by the financial officers of the Association, who, naturally, are delighted with the fruits of the enthusiasm created annually by the Festival. But the stuff and starve policy is no healthier in art than in hygiene, and it would seem to earnest music lovers as if more good would be done in the promotion of musical culture if the choir were to continue its studies all the year round, with the usual Midsummer recess, and were to be heard in choral works occasionally during the Winter. As it is, the good people of Worcester seem to think of music now only during the third week of September in each year. This policy, however, is a relic which discloses the origin of the Worcester Festivals. They sprang from the old musical conventions and and volunteer choirs, were the first really efficient musical propagandists in New England, and which efficient still maintain their popularity in places which are remote from the centres of culture. Of the character of the training, which many of these factors used to impart, perhaps the less said the better; but we cannot close our eyes to the fact that in their way they served an excellent purpose, and that they were wonderfully efficient in fostering a love for singing and a knowledge of a few of the standard choral works. The old-fashioned conventions used to compass the music of a year in Worcester county, and the Festivals do the same thing now. Eight concerts are given, besides five rehearsals, with orchestra, to which the privilege of attendance can be purchased. Since these concerts and rehearsals are practically all the high-class musical entertainments which the year affords, it seems to be necessary that consideration be had for all tastes, and, in consequence, the Worcester programmes are marvels of miscellaneousness. It happened at the last meeting, in nearly every concert, that trifling ballads were side by side with excerpts from the severest of classical masterpieces, Bach's great Organ Toccata in F, transcribed for orchestra, for instance, being followed by a setting of Bayard Taylor's "Bedouin's Love Song," with pianoforte accompaniment. Mesalliances of this character abounded in the programmes of the Festival, and robbed the affair of much of the dignity which one is justified in expecting from a Musical Festival which contains so many excellent factors as the annual meeting at Worcester. There was some disappointment, too, at the comparative triviality of the work done by the chorus. The only composition sung which was new to the Association list was Sir G. A. Macfarren's "May Day." The rest were repetitions. Lovers of choral music can scarcely be expected to look Lovers of choral music can scarcely be expected to look upon the acquisition of so light, if pretty, a Cantata as a sufficient finish of a year's study. Two Concerts a day were given on Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Festival week, and, without exception, they were fully attended. The choral works given were the Utrecht Jubilate, Henry Smart's "The Bride of Dunkerron," Bach's "A Stronghold Sure," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Macfarren's "May Day," the tribal choruses from Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," and Handel's "Messiah." An orchestra of fifty musicians from Boston provided the accompaniments and the instrumental pieces, of which the companients and the institutional pieces, or which the chief were Raft's "Lenore" Symphony, Volkmann's Sym-phony in D minor, Goldmark's "Country Wedding," and a few standard overtures. The principal soloists were Madame Fursch-Madi, Miss Emma Juch, Miss Hattie J. Clapper, Mrs. Belle Cole, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, Mr. A. E. Stoddard, Mr. D. M. Babcock, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. Besides these there was a small army of sopranos, altos, and tenors from Boston and New York, who appeared in the miscellaneous numbers of the programmes. In this department Madame Fursch-Madi stood for what was most admirable, singing Beethoven's "Ah, perfido" in a truly dramatic manner, and causing genuine astonishment by the dignity and distinctness of enunciation with which she sang her airs in "The Messiah." Very discreetly she left those of the first part to Madame Stone-Barton, not wishing to risk her reputation by attempting "Rejoice greatly," which every one knows is not in her artistic line.

"The Messiah" was given with the additional accompaniments of Robert Franz, for the first time in America, and a somewhat too daring experiment, albeit an interesting one, was made by following the new version (or rather Mozart's version), in the alternation of quartet and chorus in the numbers, "And He shall purify," "The effect was disappointing, partly because the soloists did not acquit themselves creditably, showing signs of timidity in the face of the innovation, but more because of the shock which the expectations based on tradition received. The orchestral parts were much admired, and will hence forth be used almost universally in this country, but it is exceedingly questionable whether the choruses will ever again be disturbed. In this city "The Messiah" will be heard from a new choir, organised by Mr. Edward Heimendahl, who will be remembered as at one time a violin player in London, and from the Oratorio Society in institutes which, together with the itinerant singing teacher Christmastide, both times with the Franz accompani-

The Cecilian of Philadelphia promises performances of "The Rose of Sharon," "Mors et Vita," and "The Redemption" this season, and the choir of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society is at work on "The Spectre's Bride" for production in November. The Boston Handel and Haydn is staggering a little under the financial losses of the last few seasons, and has projected only three Concerts for this year, at which the music will be "The Messiah," "Mors et Vita," and probably "Elijah."

Mr. Thomas's Popular Concerts will begin on November 3, at the Academy of Music in this city, and as Mr. Mapleson's season of twenty nights of Italian opera opens on the preceding evening, the first week in November will launch the Metropolis into the busiest musical season ever projected for it. Mr. Thomas will also conduct the Philharmonic Society, whose prospectus promises three novelties in the symphonic field—namely, Xaver Scharwenka's Symphony in C minor (Op. 60), Bernhard Scholz's Symphony in B flat (Op. 60), and Dvorák's Symphony in D minor. In the Thomas Populars we are promised Composer's nights, the first of which, on December 8, will be devoted to the music of Berlioz. The Chorus Society has been finally abandoned, but three small choirs have sprung into being to supply its place, having been organised by Frank Van der Stucken, Edward Heimendahl, and S. B. Penfield. Mr. Van der Stucken will utilise his choir in the production of choral novelties, of which he already announces the prologue to Dudley Buck's "Golden Legend," Massenet's "Narcisse," and Brahms's "Tafel-lied." Mr. Penfield has his eye on Church music as a specialty, and Mr. Heimendahl, after "The Messiah," will bring out an Idyl, for contralto solo, chorus, and orchestra, of his own composition. The affairs of the Baltimore Oratorio Society are yet involved in doubt. In Cincinnati preparations are actively making for the seventh biennial Festival to be given next May, under the direction of Theodore Thomas.

MUSIC IN AN ALPINE VILLAGE.

In a recent number of the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, Dr. Langhans, of Berlin, gives an attractive account of some musical experiences lately gathered by him during an excursion in the Tyrolese mountain ridge called the Arlberg, a branch of the Alps. The doctor was accompanied in his wanderings by Professor Sachs, organist and composer, of Munich, and remembering to have heard years ago of the existence in this district of a clergyman who, with his trained choirs of villagers, was able to accomplish the most difficult feats of a capella singing, the two musicians, forgetful of their gravely recorded vows "to listen to no note of music during holidays," determined to start off in search of this rara avis. Being told on arrival at Gaschurn, the original sphere of his activity, that the pfarrer had been removed above a twelvemonth since to the still smaller village of Gurtis, near Feldkirch, thither the two directed their steps. But it is time to follow Dr. Langhans's narretive as far as space will neemit in his own words:

rative, as far as space will permit, in his own words:—
"The parson, Herr Joseph Battlogg, is a man of middle age and of small stature, whose intellectual features, however, indicate an unusual degree of warmth of feeling, of artistic enthusiasm and energy. Indeed, the mere preliminaries of our conversation would have convinced me of his being the possessor of scientific and musical acquirements, such as would not be looked for in this rural seclusion, had I not already been cognisant of his solid and versatile critical powers, through the pages of a journal edited by him since 1878, under the title of Der Kirchenchor. Twelve years previously, in 1866, he had obtained his first ecclesiastical appointment at Gaschurn, where he founded the above choir, the achievements whereof have raised this lonely Alpine village to a certain musical significance, and great indeed was the sorrow of the more intelligent members of that small community when, in 1882, their beloved pastor was fain to leave them for his present abode. Battlogg, however, did not lose courage. What had been possible at Gaschurn could be no impossibility at Gurtis. Nor were his confident hopes to be disappointed, for his newly formed choir is already in a fair way of emulating the

"With no little eagerness of expectation did we wend our way on the following (Sunday) morning to the school-house, where the choruses to be sung at church during service were to be rehearsed. We discovered the worthy parson, armed with a fiddle and surrounded by his choristers, on the point of commencing the Mass 'Maria dixit,' by Hans Leo Hasler (1564-1612). It soon became apparent that the critical standard habitually applied by the inhabitants of the great towns would be out of place as regards the efforts of this choir; the preliminary conditions for the inducement to serious study being, in fact, entirely absent here. The Herr pfarrer, with all his spiritual authority over his parishioners, is not in a position to select his own voices. Nor, when necessity of gaining their daily bread, the long distances which some have to traverse, and other obstacles, preclude those from participating in the practices who might otherwise be the pillars of his choir, dare he grumble. This drawback appeared most noticeable in that most useful and indispensable choral material, the boys' voices, of which there was here only one to every fourteen adults. Concerning the latter, they are, as a matter of course, occupied in field labour from morning till night during week days, especially in summer-time, so that all the practising and rehearsing must needs be confined to the early hours on Sunday before service, and all the Conductor can do is to insist, not so much upon harmonious phrasing, training of the voices, and distinctness of pronunciation, as upon the correct singing of the notes. Even in this respect there was much blundering during the present rehearsal, now in this voice, now in that, and the correcting and controlling fiddle had often to come to the rescue. less, a frequently experienced result was to be repeated on this occasion; a rehearsal of doubtful character being followed by a performance successful far beyond expectation. The atmosphere of solemnity pervading divine service, the favourable acoustic properties of the sacred edifice, perhaps also the unwonted presence of strangers, combined to inspire the rustic singers to the concentration of all their powers. As a matter of fact, they acquitted themselves of their difficult task with so much zeal and intelligence, with so much purity of intonation and precision, as to make one forget the want of elaboration of detail and defective vocal

"After a short interval, allowed for the consumption of the mid-day meal, we again found ourselves assembled at church to assist at the afternoon service. The preceding repast, so far from lessening the flexibility of the throat, as many vocal experts maintain, seemed to have increased it here. Moreover, the spirits of the choristers appeared to have expanded and become more elevated since the morning. Thus the impression produced by the rendering of the Ritual psalm-singing, and of a Magnificat, in falso bordone, by Viadana, was a distinctly gratifying one. Some little share in this success may, however, be justly conceded to my friend Sachs, who had been requisitioned to preside at the organ, and who, musician sans peur et sans reproche that he is, succeeded in bringing out all the best parts of the somewhat defective instrument, achieving moreover an apparently impossible feat by executing with his ponderous Alpine shoes the most delicate passages upon the pedal. Both singers and their leader had now doubtless become entitled to the enjoyment of their Sunday rest. They, nevertheless, would make us return with them once more to the school-house, to give us a few specimens from their secular répertoire, and on which occasion I could but again admire the zeal and devotion of the parson on the one hand, and his profound acquaintance with ancient musical literature on the other. Among the pieces we heard were two Madrigals, one by Pales-trina, the other by Thomas Tallis, the Palestrina of England; a Frottola (idealised Venetian folk-song), the Motett "Ach edles Bild," by Sebastian Hollander, of Dor-trecht (the predecessor of Orlando Lasso at Munich), and finally a modern four-part song by the Feldkirch composer, Herr Briem. The heartiness of the singers, the eager attention they paid to their leader's every gesture, were again most remarkable throughout. It was pleasant, too, to witness the homely and affectionate intercourse which evidently existed between the minister and the members of his flock, and which became more apparent during the intervals between the pieces, when the Conductor related to Michael William Balfe."

the singers some historical facts connected with the music just performed and its composers. . . . But the time had arrived for our taking leave of the pleasant little village and its musical inhabitants. For a considerable distance of our way down into the valley we were accompanied by our host, and soon we were again surrounded by prosaic every day life, which, however, could not in any respect blur the vivid impression our minds had received. Surely, if artistic merit is not to be gauged by brilliant success, but rather by that idealism which even under most unfavourable outward circumstances never loses sight of its high purpose, and by that energy for which obstacles appear to exist only in order to be surmounted, then parson Battlogg merits a place of honour amongst the true promoters of our art, while, as compared to his, the merits of many a choral conductor, with far more important forces at his command, would seem to be small indeed. It was the inhabitants of this very Alpine region, concerning whom you Italian traveller (according to the historian of the St. Gall monastery, Ekkehard, IV.) jotted down into his diary the somewhat severe criticism:- 'Truly barbarian is the coarseness of their drink-affected throats. Whenever, by the alternate raising and subduing of their voices, they mean to discourse a gentle harmony, all Nature shudders, and it sounds, forsooth, as though a heavy waggon were being sluggishly driven over a frozen road in wintertime.' That was written about A.D. 1000. 800 years later his opinion would have been expressed in a widely different sense; but then, who would heed it? Maybe that after another 800 years have elapsed, someone will discover the few stray accounts which his contemporaries have written concerning parson Battlogg, and that then his earnest work will meet with its just recognition. Of the present age it cannot be hoped that it will, for once, quit the main road of musical intercourse for so trifling a matter as the artistic strivings carried on in a remote Alpine village. We have enough on our hands in observing the course of the 'stars' in the artistic heavens through the pages of our journals, to be on the look out for a new Diva, to reserve our applause for the annually increasing number of 'pianoforte giants.' From such an era no encouragement may be expected on the part of that worthy man, who not only loves and knows by heart his Palestrina, but who, in the fullest sense of the word, popularises him in however small a sphere. But the spirit of the greatest master of vocal polyphony will assuredly be with him and with his noble efforts in the domain of pure art.'

We have much pleasure in announcing that Dr. Franz Liszt has accepted an invitation from Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. to visit London, and be present at the performance of his Oratorio "St. Elizabeth," which will be given at Novello's Oratorio Concerts on April 6. Considering that it is forty years since the great master was in this country, notwithstanding that repeated offers have been made to tempt him here, we need scarcely say that the utmost interest will be felt in the fact of his being amongst us; and it may be hoped that in the preparation of his Oratorio he may at least be induced to give the benefit of his valuable counsel to the artists engaged in the presentation of his work before an English audience.

HERR HERMANN FRANKE announces that he has made arrangements with Mr. Francis Hueffer to give a series of three lectures on Modern Music. The first will be devoted to Richard Wagner; the second to Franz Liszt; the third to Hector Berlioz. The lectures will be delivered during the ensuing winter at Edinbugh, Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, and other provincial cities, and it is to be hoped they may soon be heard in London.

GOUNDD'S "Mors et Vita" will be produced in the course of the ensuing season at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, St. Louis, and Cleveland, and negotiations are in progress for its performance at Chicago, Buffalo, Troy, and Minneapolis.

We are glad to hear that a Civil List Pension of £80 has been conferred upon Madame Alina Balfe, "in recognition of the musical distinction of her late husband, Michael William Balfe."

An attractive musical service was made a special feature at the Harvest Festival, held on September 24 and 27, at the church of St. John, Bedwardine, Worcester. The usual choir and organ were, for this occasion, reinforced by a band of wind and strings, consisting of two first, and two second violins, two violas, three cellos, and two doublebasses; flute, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon; and two cornets. The opening voluntary, a Largo of Handel's in G, with a solo for the first violin, charmingly played by Mr. Edward Elgar, showed how effective the combination of band and organ could be. The processional hymn, "Come, ye thankful people, come," was given out by the full orchestra, the first verse accompanied by the organ alone, and the rest by both band and organ. The special Psalms, lxv, cxlvii, and cl, were sung respectively to chants by Turle, Marsh, and Pelham Humphreys (Grand Chant), the organ accompanying the verses, with an occasional emphasis, so to speak, from the cornet, and the instruments joining in at the Glorias. The Grand Chant was sung in unison in the key of A, the effect being very massive and striking. services were Mr. Collingwood Banks's in E flat, accompanied by the band and organ; beautiful in themselves, they went perhaps less well than the rest of the music, partly because the boys were not accustomed to sing to The Anthem "The Lord is loving unto every the beat. man," by Dr. Garrett, was charmingly sung and played. A short interlude for the instruments was inserted at the change of key and tempo, and the passage where the return to the original subject is so cleverly effected was confided to the band alone. The rest of the service consisted of familiar hymns, and Costa's March from "Naaman" as the concluding voluntary, during which the crowded congregation remained seated, at the request of the vicar. The band, the services of which were given voluntarily, consisted of members of the Worcester Instrumental Society, under their leader and Conductor, Mr. Edward Elgar. The whole of the orchestration was the work of the Organist of the Church, Mr. W. C. Box, who conducted, and played the organ, with some assistance from Mr. Davey, of Hindlip. This first attempt at an orchestral service was most successful, and may lead, it is to be hoped, to greater things. With a carefully selected chorus small Oratorios or Cantatas might be efficiently performed, and would be evidently enjoyed by the wor-shippers. The absolute stillness of the crowded congregation during the voluntaries was most remarkable, and the singing of the hymns suggested that a solution had at length been found of the puzzling problem, how to let the congregation sing without spoiling the music. During the "Now thank we all our God" we might have thought ourselves in Germany, so perfect was the swing of the time from the mass of the voices, and undoubtedly much of this was owing to the instruments. If such services became general, what a field would be opened to English composers! A Cantata of somewhat simple construction, without too many solos, within the capacities of any good church choir, but introducing some of the grand old hymn tunes in which the congregation might join, would give scope to the composer and be a great boon to church choirs. At present the choice of works suitable for worship is small, Bach's Psalms being too difficult, and so many well-known works not being of a festival or devotional character. Let us hope this hint may be acted upon before the season for Harvest Festivals comes round again.

THE Harvest Festival was celebrated at St. Peter's, Brockley, on Friday, September 25, when an Organ Recital was given by Dr. C. J. Frost, who played pieces by Grison, Hermann, Frost, Wély, Silas, and Calkin. The choir sang Stainer's Anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land," Mr. H. C. Thomas taking the bass solo; Dr. C. J. Frost's setting of the 126th Psalm, "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion," Mr. H. J. Bromley singing the tenor solo, "Turn our captivity, O Lord"; and the Hallelujah Chorus from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives." At the continuation of the Festival on the following Sunday, the services sung were Goss in F and Stainer in A; and the morning Anthem Goss's "I will magnify Thee, O Lord," with Handel's "Hallelujah" from the "Messiah," at the close of the service, the evening Anthem being Barnby's "I will give thanks," the service closing with Beethoven's "Hallelujah."

THE distribution of the prizes and certificates awarded to the successful candidates in the examinations conducted at the Derby Centre of the Royal Academy of Music took place at the St. James's Hall, Derby, on the 16th ult. place at the St. James's Hall, Derby, on the roth ult. The Mayor of Derby (Add. Hobson) presided, and there were also present—Sir Wm. Harcourt, M.P., Ald. Roe, M.P., Hon. G. N. Curzon, Mr. John Moody, Mr. A. F. Smith, Mus. Bac., and Mr. E. Chadfield (the local secretaries), &c. The Mayor said it might be remembered that during his previous Mayoralty in presenting these awards, he presumed to offer some remarks upon the general advantages and utility of a musical education, especially in association with that centre of the Royal Academy, which had such a healthy and active branch in their midst. He would only congratulate the centre upon the rapid progress which it had made both in the numbers and in the excellence of the instruction given to the students. He had been requested by the local representatives to read a letter which had been addressed to them by Mr. Arthur O'Leary, the appointed examiner for the centre, in which he said that the great progress made by the centre was illustrated by the high number of honours gained last spring. When it was remembered that five years ago only one candidate gained the higher distinction, the test being then less severe, the present results were most encouraging. After the performance of an excellent selection of music by the students, the prizes were delivered by Sir William Harcourt, who preceded this ceremony by an eloquent speech.

The 200th consecutive Monthly Concert of the St. George's Giee Union was given on the 2nd ult., in the Pimlico Rooms, Warwick Street, to a densely crowded audience. The excellent rendering of the Part Songs:—
"My true love hath my heart" (Henry Smart), "You stole my love" (Walter Macfarren), "Good night, beloved" (Pinsuti), "My bonny lass she smileth" (T. Morley, A.D. 1595), "The Vikings" (Eaton Faning), "Sweet and low" (J. Barnby), "When winds breathe soft" (S. Webbe), and "Allegiance we swear" (Sir H. R. Bishop), by a choir of about ninety voices, proved that great pains had been taken by the Conductor, Mr. Joseph Monday, to make this eventful Concert a most successful one. The artists who took part were Miss Kate Flinn, Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Helen d'Alton, Mr. Orlando Harley, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom sang their very best. The pianoforte solos "Venezia e Napoli" (Tarantelle), Liszt, and March from "Tannhäuser," Liszt, were admirably played by Madame Emily Tate and Mr. Charles F. Reddie respectively. Mr. F. R. Kinkee presided at the pianoforte. As far as can be ascertained, the St. George's Glee Union is the only Musical Society in London which has had such a long and successful career; and it is to be congratulated not only for its present achievement, but also for the good Musical work it has accomplished since its formation in 1869.

THE Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Services at All. Saints' Church, South Lambeth, were held on the 15th and 18th ult. The music given on the first occasion included Tours's Evening Service in F, Barnby's Anthem. "I will give thanks," and Handel's Hallelujah Chorus. The choral portion of the Service on the 18th ult. comprised, in the morning, Te Deum (Dykes, in F); Jubilate (Smart, in F); Anthem, "O Lord how manifold" (Barnby), Kyrie (Agutter, in B flat), and Martin's Offertory Sentences. The evening celebration was mostly identical with that of the opening service, except that the anthem was Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land" (solo, Mr. H. D. Warwick). The singing was highly praiseworthy throughout, reflecting credit upon the organist and choirmaster, Mr. Walter Attersoll.

THE Annual Dedication and Harvest Festival was celebrated at St. Luke's, Brompton Hospital, on the 18th ult., when the church was visited by a large number of friends and officers of the staff. The sermon in the morning was preached by Canon Cromwell, and in the evening by the Rev. Ravenscroft Stewart, vicar of All Saints', Ennismore Gardens. The services, which were fully choral, and the anthems, "O be joyful in God" (Gilbert Webb), and "O Lord how manifold" (Barnby), were very effectively sung by the church choir. Mr. F. Gilbert Webb presided at the organ.

WE are informed that six Concerts will be given by the Philharmonic Society, on March 4 and 18, 1886, April 1 and 15, May 19, and June 2. The novelties promised during the season are a Suite by Moszkowski, and orchestral works by M. Saint-Saëns and Mr. Henry Gadsby. Mr. E. Prout's Birmingham Symphony, in F, and the "Eroica" and "Choral" Symphonies of Beethoven will also be given. The same composer's Concerto in G (performed by M. Saint-Saëns), and Triple Concerto, played by Madame Frickenhaus, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti, will be welcome items in the programme; and it is said that the Directors contemplate introducing Bennett's rarely heard third Concerto in C minor. tiations have been opened with Gounod, Délibes, Dvorák, Sullivan, and Mackenzie, with the view of securing new compositions from their pens; and offers of engagement have been forwarded to Madame Schumann, Herr Rubin-stein, and Madame Menter. Whatever may be the result of the correspondence with these eminent artists, there can be no question that every credit is due to the Directors for their earnest efforts to secure works and artists for the coming season worthy of sustaining the reputation of the Philharmonic Society.

On Tuesday evening, the 6th ult., the inaugural address of the session at Trinity College, London, was delivered by the Warden, the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, Mus. B., on "The place of Criticism in Musical Study," and was followed by the distribution of diplomas, certificates, and medals, gained by candidates at the higher examinations in July last. In his address, the Warden said criticism was the salt of study. It is true that one may have too much of it; but the absence of it would be unwholesome for the pupil; and, referring more particularly to the student of theory, he then set forth some of the relations of the professor, in his capacity of critic to the student, and of the students as critics of each other, pointing out the difficulties of the tasks undertaken. Students should never offer criticism unless it be invited; but, if asked for, it should be fearlessly given, though rather in the form of suggestion than dogmatically. We should bear criticism patiently and unflinchingly, as it will, at all events, teach us a little wholesome humility, and prevent us from arriving at that condition of self-satisfaction, which was of all things most fatal to the well-being of the pupil.

The annual Meeting of the North Midland section of the Society of Professional Musicians was held at the house of Mr. Arthur Page, Castle Gate, Nottingham, on Saturday, the 17th ult. Mr. Smith, the secretary, gave an interesting statement of the work of the Society during the past year, from which it appeared that its growth had been very great, more especially in the south and south-west of the Kingdom. New sections are to be at once inaugurated in connection with Bristol, Exeter, and Plymouth, in which neighbourhood all the leading musicians have joined. The financial position of the Midland section is highly satisfactory, there being a good balance in the hands of the treasurer. The council of the district for the coming year was formed after vote by ballot. Messrs. Arthur Page, F.C.O., and A. F. Smith, Mus. Bac., were re-elected treasurer and secretary for the district, and the same two gentlemen are also re-elected a delegates to the general council of the Society. Mr. E. Prout (London), Dr. Heap, A. R. Gaul, Mus. Bac., J. Heywood, T. M. Abbott, and J. R. Reeve, all of Birmingham, were duly proposed and elected members of the Society.

The members of the Walworth Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" on Monday, the 28th ult., at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, which was fairly well filled. The solos were well rendered by Madame Reichelman, Mr. Harper Kearton Mr. Mullerhausen, and Mr. F. May. Mr. Harper Kearton in "Love sounds the alarm," Mr. F. May in "O ruddier than the cherry," and Madame Reichelman in "Hush, ye pretty warbling choir," were thoroughly appreciated and much applauded. The chorus singing was very effective, showing careful training on the part of the Conductor, Mr. W. E. Curtis. The band was highly efficient, under Mr. F. Crome as leader, and Mr. W. W. Crome was an able accompanist. In the second part a miscellaneous selection was given.

A REMARKABLE illustration of the development of the telephone was afforded on Sunday, the 4th ult., by the local manager of the National Telephone Company, Limited, Prideaux Chambers, Change Alley, Sheffield. The telephone wires between Sheffield and Bradford being extended to St. Paul's Church, Manningham, a number of ladies, with several members of the Town Council and other gentlemen, had the gratification of listening, in Sheffield, to the morning and evening services in the church at Manningham. The hymns and anthems were particularly clear and resonant. The voluntaries at both services were heard distinctly, and were exceedingly creditable to the organist (Mr. J. H. Rooks), who was aware that a "congregation" at Sheffield was listening to his playing. The favourite hymn, "Alleluia," came through splendidly, as well as the Hallelujah Chorus and the anthem, all being most distinctly heard. The Change Alley congregation numbered fifteen in the morning, and eighteen in the evening. At the same time between sixty and seventy of the company's subscribers in Bradford and Huddersfield were listening to the same services. The length of the vires was sixty-six miles and 132 miles respectively, thus showing that the difficulties of long-distance telephoning have, to a certain extent, been surmounted.

MRS. MARIANNE HARPER (widow of Mr. Edmund B. Harper), whose death we record with sincere regret in our obituary of this month, was formerly a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and much esteemed as a concert-singer, not only in London, but at Leipzig, where at the Gewandhaus Concerts she sang with decided success during the season 1844-45. A sister of Mr. Henry J. Lincoln—at whose excellent "Musical Evenings" she was the principal vocalist—she was known to the public under her maiden name. Her married life was spent in Hillsborough, Ireland, where her husband held the post of organist to the Marquis of Downshire, and where she played the leading parts in all the private operatic performances organised by the Marchioness of Downshire. She retained a vivid recollection of the eminent artists she met with during her visit to Germany—Mendelssohn, Gade, David, Dr. and Madame Schumann, and Hauptmann amongst the rest—and her loss will long be felt by the many friends to whom she had so endeared herself.

The members of the Grosvenor Choral Society held their 164th monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday, the 16th ult. The solo vocalists were Mrs. D. Woodhouse, Miss Berrie Stephens, Miss Kate Ridgway, Miss Jeanie Rosse, and Mr. Donnel Balfe. Planfofre solos were contributed by Mrs. A. J. Layton. The part music, which was rendered with much precision and expression, included "Sing on with cheefful strain" (Elliott), "Hail to the chief" (Bishop), "The lion and the four wolves" (Fiby), "The cloud-capt towers" (Stevens), "Hark! 'is the horn of the hunter" (Mackenzie), "The chough and crow" (Bishop), and "Softly fall the shades of evening" (Hatton.) Mrs. T. P. Frame accompanied, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

On Sunday, the 1rth ult., Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was rendered, with full orchestral accompaniment, at the Royal Military (Guards) Chapel, St. James's Park, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, Precentor of the Chapel. The band, numbering thirty performers, was composed of members of the principal orchestras in London, the wind instrument performers being members of the Guards Bands. The Chapel was thronged, and hundreds were unable to gain admission. We understand that Mr. Lemaire contemplates giving another series of these Oratorio Services, the first being on Sunday, the 29th inst., when the greater part of "Elijah" will be given.

At the recent musical Examinations at Oxford University the following have satisfied the examiners: For the Degree of Mus. Bac.—William A. C. Cruickshank, Keble College, and of Burnley; Theophilus Hemmings, New College, and of Stoke-on-Trent; Reginald B. Moore, New College, and of Exeter; Frederick Pugh, New College, and of Chorlton-on-Medlock. For the Degree of Mus. Doc.—Henry Coy, New College, and of Sale, near Manchester; Albert G. Mitchell, New College, and of Ramsgate.

A PHOTOGRAPH has recently been received in England of the portrait of Beethoven lately discovered at Freiburg. It was painted in oils by J. Mähler, of Vienna, in 1815, and is now in the possession of Herr Victor von Gleichenstein. It is an undoubted likeness, although it differs from many of the existing pictures and busts, which, according to Sir George Grove, "either idealise him into a sort of Jupiter Olympus, or rob him of all expression." In the Freiburg painting, which is in an excellent state of preservation, the Dutch origin of the composer is evident, and the piercing black eyes, which look straight into the face of the spectator, justify the assertion of his biographer that they were "the special feature of the face, and it was in them that the earnestness and sincerity of his character beamed forth."

The prospectus of the Finsbury Choral Association, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Dale, promises three Subscription Concerts during the season 1885-86, at the first of which, on December 8, will be performed Handel's "Judas Maccabæus"; at the second, on February 18, 1886, Stainer's Cantata, "St. Mary Magdalen," and J. F. Barnett's Cantata, "The Ancient Mariner" (both under the personal direction of the composers of the works); and at the third, on April 8, Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul." A performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday is also contemplated. For the performance of "Judas Maccabæus" and "St. Paul" a full professional orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus, will be engaged.

THE Harvest Festival at St. John's Church, Bethnal Green, was held on Thursday evening, the 8th ult. The ordinary choir was assisted by a contingent from the choirs of 8t. Mary's, Haggerston, and 8t. Michael's, Bowes, Southgate, numbering in all seventy-five. The Service was Tours in F, and the anthem "Blessed be Thou," by Dr. Bunnett. After service "The Heavens are telling" ("Creation") was sung, accompanied with orchestra. Mr. H. Baker, of St. Michael's, Bowes, Southgate, presided at the organ. The Orchestral Voluntaries were March. "St. Polycarp" (Ouseley) and March (Sainton-Dolby). Mr. W. H. Ward, organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted and arranged the music for the Festival.

The South London Choral Association announces for performance during the approaching season Spobr's "Last Judgment," Gaul's "Holy City," Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," Gade's "Psyche," Handel's "Messiah," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." With the exception of the two last-named works, none of the foregoing have been previously rendered by the Association. The orchestral band connected with the Society will, in addition to supporting the accompaniments, give performances of Prout's Symphony in F, Raff's "Italian" Suite, De Beriot's Ninth Violin Concerto, Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante, for pianoforte and orchestra, and other items. Mr. Leonard C. Venables retains the post of Conductor.

The prospectus of the Middlesbrough Musical Union, after referring with pardonable pride to its recent performances of "The Redemption," "Elijah," "The Crusaders," "The Sun-Worshippers," &c., announces for the first Concert of the season, on December 16, Handel's "Messiah," with Miss Clara Samuell, Madame Bolingbroke, Mr. H. T. Bywater, and Mr. W. H. Brereton as principal vocalists. The details of the second Concert, in April, have not yet been considered by the Committee; but it is hoped that at least one of the most interesting of the recent novelties will be introduced, say Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," or Prout's Orchestral Symphony.

A PAMPHLET called "A Plea for the Reform of Music Teaching," by Miss Susan Wood (late Head Mistress of the Bath High School for Girls), deserves to be extensively read; for although in our own columns, as well as in those of many of our contemporaries, the subject treated of by Miss Wood has been frequently and lengthily discussed, we are glad to call attention to the labours of one more earnest and talented worker in the cause.

ANTONÍN DVORÁK'S "Patriotic Hymn" will be performed by the Philharmonic Society of Brünn (Moravia) on the 1st of December. The same Society announces a performance of "The Spectre's Bride," to be given at Easter, 1886, which will be conducted by the composer.

The prospectus of the Apollo Musical Club, Chicago (under the conductorship of Mr. Wm. L. Tomlins), announces four Concerts during the coming season, at the first of which, on the 19th inst., Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given; at the second, on December 29, Handel's "Messiah"; at the third, on February 25, 1886, a miscellaneous programme, when an eminent European soloist will make his first appearance; and at the fourth, on April 29, Goring Thomas's Cantata "The Sun Worshippers," Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," and Berlioz's Te Deum, for orchestra, organ, double chorus, three supplementary bands, and choir of 200 children.

A NEW Musical Society, consisting of amateur and professional musicians, was inaugurated on the 6th ult. at the Grocers' Company's Schools, Hackney Downs. Mr. E. Prout, B.A., was elected President; Dr. W. H. Monk and Rev. C. G. Gull, M.A., Vice-Presidents; and Mr. A. Trickett, Hon. Secretary. A council was elected, consisting of Dr. Gordon Saunders, Dr. Pringuer, Mr. Fountain Meen, Mr. S. Moore, Mr. W. M. Wait, Rev. F. Leach, Mr. Smith, Mr. Bridge, Mr. Gray, Mr. Davison, and Mr. Black. Dr. Mark, in addition to being Vice-President, will officiate as Treasurer. The Society will meet monthly throughout the year, with the exception of June, July, and August.

Harvest Thanksgiving was celebrated in St. Luke's Church, Hackney, on Friday and Sunday, the 16th and 18th ult., when the church was densely crowded. The services throughout were fully choral. The Te Deum was Sullivan in D; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Hoyte in B flat; the anthems were "I will give thanks," Mozart; and "Ye shall dwell in the land," Stainer. The bass solo was well sung by Mr. C. Rowcliffe, Choirmaster, to whom great credit is due for the success attending the services. Mr. Rowcliffe, Jun. (the Organist), gave a short Recital after the evening service, the programme including Handel's First Concerto, "Grand Cheeur in D," Guilmant, &c.

The season of the Victoria Glee Club was opened by a Smoking Concert in the Westminster Town Hall, on Saturday, the 17th ult. Dr. Bridge (the President) presided. Messrs. W. Sexton, G. T. Carter, F. Cozens, and E. J. Bell sang several quartets, and Messrs. S. Kessell and C. R. Bayley were the soloists. The glees on this occasion were rendered by an augmented choir. A quartet of strings from the Royal Orchestral Society, under Mr. T. Murby, contributed much to the success of the evening. Mr. James Hallé gave a pianoforte solo, and also acted as accompanist. Mr. W. Sexton conducted.

By an advertisement in another part of our columns, our readers will perceive that the Royal College of Music proposes to throw open some of the scholarships, which come up for election in the spring, to orchestral wind instruments (wood and brass). These scholarships confer free musical education on the holders for a period of not less than three years, and the boon is one not often enjoyed, especially by students of the instruments in question. We therefore direct the special attention of our professional readers to the subject. Particulars as to age, &c., can be obtained at the College.

A Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was held on the 22nd ult., at Limehouse Parish Church, the service being fully choral. The prayers were intoned by Canon Gilbertson. The canticles were sung to Bunnett in F, the anthem being "The Glory of the Lord" (Goss). At the conclusion of the service, the "Gloria," from Mozart's Twelfth Mass, was sung. The Festival was continued on the following Sunday, the anthem in the morning being "O Lord, how manifold" (Barnby), and in the evening "O give thanks" (Sydenham). Mr. William Yabslay, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ at each service.

THE arrangements for the Orchestral Concerts to be given by the Glasgow Choral Union, during the season 1885-86, are so fully detailed in the letter, which appears in our present number, on "Music in Glasgow and the West of Scotland," that it is unnecessary to do more than call attention to the exceptionally attractive character of the prospectus. It must be mentioned, however, that in addition to the performances already alluded to, ten Saturday Popular Concerts will take place, the programmes of which it is anticipated will also be of the highest interest.

At the final meeting of stewards of the late Hereford Pestival, the executive committee reported that the total amount received from offertories, collections, and donations is £990 78. 5d., which is considerably larger than that at the Festival held in 1882. The accounts, however, will not be made up until the 1st inst., so that the sum to be handed to the charity may be still larger. Cordial and thoroughly deserved thanks were voted to the Rev. B. L. S. Stanhope, hon. secretary, Mr. J. W. Capner, secretary, and also to the Conductor, Dr. Colborne, for their valuable services during the Festival.

A NEW Society for the practice of orchestral music has been formed at Finsbury Park, under the title of "The North London Philharmonic Society." The names of a number of members have already been enrolled, and the Society bids fair to assume a very promising aspect. The services of Mr. Henry J. Baker have been secured as Honorary Conductor; and it is to be hoped that amateurs in this neighbourhood will do their utmost to support the movement. The hon. secretary, Mr. F. Drake, I, Stapleton Hall Road, N., will be happy to supply all particulars on application.

The programme of the Toronto Philharmonic Society (under the conductorship of Mr. F. H. Torrington) for the thirteenth season, 1885-86, will comprise Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and Gounod's "Mors et Vita." It is also announced that a scheme for a Musical Festival, to be held in May or June, 1886, when Handel's "Israel in Egypt" is to be performed, will be shortly submitted to the Toronto public, and a hope is expressed that this Festival will inaugurate a series, to be held at regular intervals, on the plan of those at Birmingham.

The Dover Harmonic Society, under the Conductorship of Mr. J. W. Howells, announces three Concerts during the season 1885-86, at the first of which, in December, Handel's "Messiah" will be given; at the second, in February, 1886, Handel's "Acis and Galatea," and a miscellaneous second part; and at the third, in May, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." It is much to be hoped that the musical public of Dover will give support and encouragement to so excellent an Association by becoming either active members or honorary subscribers.

The third series of Popular Chamber Concerts will be given at the Highgate Literary and Scientific Institution, under the direction of Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann, on the 5th and 79th inst., and December 3 and 7. Messrs. Betjemann, Hann, Channel, and Signor Pezze form the quartet, and Miss Margaret Gyde, Messrs. Fountain Meen, G. R. Betjemann, and Walter Macfarren are the pianists. Miss Ada Iggulden, Miss Mary Davies, Messrs. J. Bridson and Wm. Shakespeare will contribute the vocal portions of the programme.

The Annual Harvest Festival Services were held at St. Alphage Church, London Wall, on Sunday, the 11th ult. The sermons were preached by the Rector, the Rev. R. Wheler Bush, M.A. The anthems, "He in tears that soweth" (Hiller) and "Blessed be the name" (Gadsbyl, were well rendered. The Te Deum and Jubilate were Sullivan's in D, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Prout in F. At the close of the evening service Mr. A. C. Tattersall, Organist of the church, gave an excellent Organ Recital.

During the past month the Glee Choir from the Criterion has given a series of Concerts in the Royal Albert Hall in connection with the Inventions Exhibition. The programmes contained an excellent selection of Glees, Part Songs, Madrigals, &c., which have been well rendered under the conductorship of Mr. Richard Mackway.

We are glad to find that Miss Margaret Gyde, a young pianist whose exceptional powers we have noticed from time to time in this journal, made her first appearance, since her prolonged indisposition, at the Crystal Palace, on the 16th ult., playing Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in F minor with such marked success as to ensure an enthusiastic recall. Miss Gyde is engaged at Mr. Betjemann's Classical Chamber Concerts at Highgate, and her services are also secured for several provincial Concerts.

The appeal of Mr. F. Cellier, of the Savoy Theatre, on behalf of the widow and eight children of Mr. John Wilson, a trombone player at the above establishment, who has recently died, leaving his family totally unprovided for, will, we hope, be liberally responded to by those whose hearts and purses are ever open to the pressing needs of musical artists. He was well known and highly respected in the profession; and Mr. Cellier announces that any donations sent to him for the fund will be gladly received and duly acknowledged.

DR. SPARK was the Organist at the Bow and Bromley Organ Recital on the 24th ult., the other artists being, Miss Janet G. Sneddon, R.A.M., vocalist; solo violin, Miss Adela Duckham; pianoforte, Miss Adela Duckham and Mr. Lindsay Sloper; accompanist, Mr. Fountain Meen. An excellent programme was well rendered, Dr. Spark's contributions being much applauded. The violin and pianoforte performances of Miss Adela Duckham, a little girl only eleven years old, were features of the Concert.

The seventh season of the Subscription Smoking Concerts, at the Cannon Street Hotel, commences on the 24th inst., the remaining Concerts being announced for December 22, January 26, 1886, March 23, and May 4, the last a ladies' night. The artists are Mr. Herbert Schartau, Mr. James Brown, Mr. Albert James, Mr. Arthur Thompson, Mr. J. W. Manchester, Mr. W. G. Forington, Mr. C. T. Johnson, and Mr. James Matthews; accompanists, Mr. Fountain Meen and Mr. Alfred Izard.

The Bohemian Musical Society, at the Crystal Palace, announces a series of eight Concerts for theseason 1835-86 (commencing on the 6th inst.), two of which will be "Ladies' Evenings." The success which attended the inauguration of the Society last year was so great that the accommodation was found insufficient; and the present series of Concerts will be given in the Marble Hall, at the south-west end of the Palace.

Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held in Dulwich College Chapel of Ease on Sunday, the 17th ult. The music was well rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. William H. Stocks, A.C.O., Organist of the Chapel. The morning service was Dr. C. H. H. Parry in D, and the evening service Sir G. A. Macfarren in G. The anthem was "Fear not, O land" (C. H. Lloyd), and the Offertory Sentences were by Dr. G. C. Martin.

The death is announced at Passy of M. Bernhard Ulmann, a gentleman who, as agent for many of the leading artists, has long exercised considerable influence over Italian operatic affairs in his country. M. Ulmann was manager of the American tours of the famous pianist Thalberg in 1855-6, and it was under the joint direction of MM. Ulmann and Maurice Strakosch, that Madame Patti made her first regular début in New York in 1859.

THE Committee of the Bath Philharmonic Society informs us that, owing to the success of the last series of Concerts, three Concerts will be given this season. The first will take place on December 5; and at the second "The Martyr of Antioch" will be performed. For the third Concert the work has not yet been selected, but the choice, it is believed, will fall upon a production from an English pen.

HERR HERMANN FRANKE announces four Concerts of Chamber Music at Princes' Hall, Piccadilly, on the following dates: Saturday, the 14th inst.; Tuesdays, December 8 and 15; and Saturday, December 19, at each of which the Heckmann Quartet will appear. The programmes are of the highest interest, that on the last evening being devoted exclusively to the works of Beethoven.

DVORAK'S Birmingham Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride," will be performed during the forthcoming season in the United States at Brooklyn, Worcester, Providence, and Milwaukee, and arrangements are pending for its production at Baltimore and Cleveland.

Messrs. W. Morley and Co. have found it necessary to remove from 269, Regent Street, to more extensive premises, situate at 127 in the same street.

REVIEWS.

Composed by A. C. Mackenzie. Eighteen Songs. Op. 31. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A FEW of these songs have appeared before in a separate form, but the bulk of them are new, and all are good. We do not hesitate to express a belief that the collection before us will place Mr. Mackenzie in the highest rank of song-composers, no matter to what country they belong. He should be classed with Schubert, Schumann, Franz, and others who have carried the German Lied to its fullest artistic development. At any rate, he follows in their steps, and near enough to be described as of their worthy company. Looking through these eighteen compositions, we are struck with a sustained beauty, in unison with continuous variety. There is nothing stereotyped about Mr. Mackenzie's forms. Each song differs from its companions, while keeping, so to speak, upon the same plane, and having the same essential qualities. It is this diversity in unity the same essential qualities. It is this diversity in unity which impresses the amateur, not less by its suggested wealth of resource than by the actual freshness and piquancy which it secures. It may honestly be said that here we have not a "dry" page. To go through the book is to wander through a garden which presents at every turn a new and agreeable parterne. The collection begins with Burns's "Phyllis the fair," into which the composer infuses an unobtrusive Scottish element, standing for "local Then we have Hood's "It was a time of roses. a work of higher pretensions than the foregoing; followed by Frederick Locker's "Light slumber is quitting the eyelids," wherein Mr. Mackenzie appears at his best. This is really a gem of its kind, and speaks volumes for the delicate grace and subtle beauty of the composer's fancies. Next in order is a setting of Scott's "O hush thee, my babie," partly constructed upon the scale called pentatonic, because it avoids the fourth and seventh. Here, for Here, for example, is a characteristic phrase :-

A slight touch in the manner of the foregoing gives an appreciable national flavour, while leaving the composer free to employ the resources of the complete scale else-where. Charles Grant's "The Earth below and the Heaven above" is next set to music as full of charm as of musicianly skill. The true note of passion is here sounded, and tenor vocalists, if they are wise, will pay heed to the fact. Swinburne's, " If love were what the rose is," makes more modest pretensions than its immediate predecessor, and it may be that amateurs will feel attracted onwards by two settings of Tennyson's "What does little birdie say?" These, written in very different styles, naturally challenge comparison. Our own verdict, if peremptorily demanded, would probably be given to the first, which we consider one of the most beautiful songs in existence. Its gentle and tender loveliness exactly befits the theme, and the varied richness of the accompaniment is a powerful enhancement of the general effect. The second setting has its own distinctive merits, which are of no mean order. Vidal's poem, "Of all sweet birds," invited an archaic effect, and Mr. Mackenzie has supplied this by writing in D minor, with C natural as the seventh of the scale. The effect is quaint and not unpleasing, while contrast is supplied by an ending in the relative major. The following extract will illustrate this song's chief characteristic-

Charles Grant's "Lift my spirit up to thee" is another of the impassioned strains which Mr. Mackenzie knows so well how to write, and in Blaikie's "Russian love-song" we have characteristics which, whether Russian or not, are fresh and charming. An ardent love-song is Lock-hart's "While my lady sleepeth," and Tennyson's "Song of love and death" is set to exquisite music, full of deep

Its appeal both to sentiment and artistic perception is irresistible. Christina Rosetti's "First Spring Day" and "When I am dead" follow next in order, each having many points of interest. So with the same writer's "A Birthday," and, in a very different style, with Logie Robertson's "Up with the sail." In the last named and in "O roaming wind" Mr. Mackenzie strikes a bolder note, with a hand not less true and skilful than before. In the final song of the set, however, he returns to the vein of tender sentiment. His music to Robertson's "Something sad" is simply lovely and ear-haunting. Amateurs who are watching the development of native talent all around us will recognise in these compositions works of which their country may be proud.

The Organist's Quarterly Fournal. Parts LXV. to LXVIII. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

HERE we have the four instalments for the present year of Dr. Spark's publication. Sixteen years have elapsed since the first number of the Organist's Quarterly fournal appeared, and it is now in its ninth volume. This is sufficient evidence of the usefulness of the work, and though criticism may be applied to the individual compositions, no question can now arise as to whether or not the Journal itself has a raison d'être. Nor would it be reasonable to complain because the whole of the pieces are not of equal excellence. It is not in the editor's power to command masterpieces; he can but choose the best of the works which are offered, and there is every reason to believe that he discharges this duty with discretion and tact. The contents of the January part are sufficiently varied to suit all tastes. An Andante, by Otto Dienel, a Berlin organist, and an Andante con moto, by Stephen Kemp, are melodious sketches suitable for opening voluntaries, and a brightly-written Postludium Festivum, by Dr. Charles Pearce, amply justifies its title. More important than these, however, is a so-called Pastorella, by Paul Barclay, in which a taking theme is subjected to some clever variations and developments. Recital players will find this an effective piece. so-called Sonata, by Julius Katterfeldt, would be better described as a rhapsody, as it consists of a number of brief movements strung together in no apparent order, and without much musical interest. Part LXVI. commences with an easy set of Variations on the old melody, "O sanctissima," better known as the "Sicilian Mariners' Hymn," by George Hepworth. A Morning Prayer, by Dr. E. W. Taylor, is vague and rambling, the composer indulging in constant changes of key without apparent reason. Dr. constant changes of key without apparent reason. Dr. Varley Roberts's Larghetto and Allegro is a spirited piece, and Two Sketches, of the first order of simplicity, by J. L. Gregory, may be useful. A Postlude, by G. Hermann Lott, in the Wély style, is designed, evidently, to catch the popular ear. By far the best piece in the July part is. an Allegro pomposo, by Ferris Tozer. This is an extremely energetic and vigorous composition, and distinguished by freshness of style. A Funeral March on the choral "Jesu, my Trust," by Otto Dienel, is lengthy and rather dull. A favourable word may be said for a Meditation, by E. Cutler, and also for a broadly-written, straightforward Fantasia, by Hugo Katterfeldt. There is a good deal of cleverness in the Fantasia on the ancient Hebrew melody, "O Filie et Filiæ," by Alan Gray, which opens Part LXVIII., but it is somewhat over lengthy. The editor's Allegretto would also bear compression. Dr. Jacob Bradford's Introduction and Fugue is not remarkable for any display of contrapuntal science.

Communion Service in E. By C. Warwick Jordan. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This work was composed for the London Gregorian Choral Association, of which Mr. Warwick Jordan is honorary organist. It includes the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, now commonly sung in churches where high ritual prevails, and has ad libitum parts for trumpets and trombones, also available for cornets and euphoniums. At the outset we meet with an innovation which has something to commend it. The first nine Kyries are almost in monotone, while the tenth is quite a little anthem with soli. It is certain that a melodious phrase nine times repeated becomes more monotonous than a simple inflection feeling. Here we have one of the gems of the collection. as here given. On the other hand, the sudden cessation of congregational singing at the tenth Kyrie might seem a little incongruous, and the composer meets this objection by also providing Kyries of the ordinary type. There is no suggestion of plain-song in the service generally. On the contrary, the music is essentially modern in style, though at times the voice parts are studiously simple. For example, in the Credo-a remarkably effective setting-the voices are either in plain four-part harmony or else in unison and octaves, while the accompaniment is elaborate and orchestral in feeling. On the other hand, there is a capital fugal movement in the Sanctus and another in the Gloria in excelsis. The Benedictus and Agnus Dei are distinguished by Italian sweetness of melody. In short, the entire service is the work of an accomplished musician who lives in the present and not the past. It is nineteenth century church music and well worthy to represent its epoch.

The Home Hymn Book, with accompanying tunes. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE title of this work at once places it beyond the danger of comparison with the numerous hymnals for use in public worship which have been issued within the last twenty or thirty years. Any addition to their number must be deprecated unless, which is scarcely possible, the compilers could show that some portion of the ground remains to be occupied. But, as the present editors observe, "comparatively little has been done for devotional music in our homes," and they express the hope that this work, "besides accomplishing its higher mission, will be a means of fostering and extending a pure musical taste, more especially among our children." Let us hasten to say that their task has been carried out in a manner that, however it may be regarded, calls for cordial approval. The book contains 372 hymns, and is divided into two parts, the second division consisting of 143 hymns for children; though why the National Anthem should have been included among these we do not exactly perceive. There are hymns for school-days, holidays, birthdays, and other special occasions. In the section for adults, beside hymns for the church's seasons, there are many suitable for social anniversaries, including one for a golden wedding. Only twenty-two of the whole number, however, appear for Only twenty-two of the whole humber, however, high, the first time, while there are no fewer than ninety-three new tunes, the average merit of which is very high. is evidence of artistic discretion and taste in their selection, and the temptation to insert adaptations from secular works has been wholly resisted, though, of course, such adaptations would be less objectionable in the home circle than in the church. For the same reason the part-song-like character of some of the tunes is a merit rather than otherwise, as flippancy and vulgarity have been carefully avoided. Nearly all the contributions are perfect from a musicianly point of view, and curiously enough, the only exceptions we have noted—Nos. 8 and 261—are from the pen of a doctor of music. A candidate in a harmony examination who presented either of these would probably be ruthlessly plucked. The only other objectionable progression we have noticed is in eighty-nine, third line, where the harsh effect of the tritone could easily be avoided by a B flat in the melody. Among the best of the new tunes are those of Mr. C. A. Barry, Mr. P. H. Diemer, Mr. Myles B. Foster, Mr. Edwin Moss, and Mr. Berthold Tours. "The Home Hymn Book" is handy in size, and beautifully printed. It meets a distinct want, and should therefore find ready acceptance with the public.

FOREIGN NOTES.

An International Conference is to be convened at Vienna, at the instance of the Austrian Government, to consider the adoption of a uniform musical pitch in Europe. question of reform in this direction had originally been raised in the Austrian capital as a purely local one, and owing to the exertions of Herr Jahn, the director of the Opera, the necessary means had been granted for lowering the orchestral pitch at that establishment. In the meantime, however, inquiries had been instituted into the subject on behalf of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, which have established the fact, inter alia, of a more or less serious discrepancy existing even between the individual military bands of the Empire. A representative committee has now been formed to investigate the matter still further and to prepare the material to be laid before the proposed Congress. The German Government, it is said, has already promised its active support of the scheme. There can be no doubt that the general adoption of the French diapason, already introduced in several European states, will form the basis of the much needed reform. How absurdly various the diapason has become, even in one and the same country, may be sufficiently inferred from the state of things in our own. Thus, at Milan, the number of vibrations to the normal A are 864; at Turin, 889'5; at Florence, 880; at Rome, 900; at Berlin, 899'5; at Leipzig, 897'5; at Dresden, 882; at Stuttgart, 886; at Munich, 896'2; at Pesth, 892; at Prague, 903; at St. Petersburg, 870; and so on. Of course, the whole question of reform resolves itself into one of expense, but it is an expense which modern civilisation itself demands to be incurred. There have been but few representative performances in Germany commemorative of the three-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Heinrich Schütz, the precursor, in more than one respect, of both Bach and Handel, the composer of "Passion Music," and the first who naturalised the then new art-form, the Dramma per musica, i.e., opera, in his own country. The very partial and somewhat lukewarm recognition of the claims upon his countrymen by this composer is the more surprising considering the growing tendency of the age to render justice to the great masters of bygone periods in that most practical of all ways, i.e., the revival of their It was on October 8, 1585, that Schütz first saw the light, at Köstritz, in Saxony, and we have already recorded in these columns the one or two special performances by which the tercentenary through which we have thus passed has been commemorated abroad. To these may now be added what appears to have been a very worthy celebration of the event instituted on the 9th and 11th ult., by the Riedel'sche Gesangverein, of Leipzig. The performances took place at St. Nicholas's church, of that classical city of music, the following numbers being that classical city of music, the following numbers being included in the programme—viz., First Day: Psalm 18, for alto solo; Psalm 130, for double chorus; Cantata ("Der Engel und Maria," for alto and soprano solo, chorus and string orchestra; Passion Oratorio "Die sieben Worte"; Oratorio "Saul," for chorus, stringorchestra, and organ; Lord's Prayer, for soli, chorus, astringed instruments, Second Day: The grand "Passion Music" (Riedel's edition). In addition to the above compositions by Schütz, there were also included in the performances a Sonata, by Gabrieli (whose pupil he was), and a few illustrations of the style of Bach and Handel. Herr Riedel, himself one of the greatest authorities on the works of Heinrich Schütz, conducted the Festival.

The firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, announce the impending issue of a complete and critically revised edition of the works of Heinrich Schütz. This interesting and most welcome publication will comprise ten volumes, and is to be completed in 1890. Another debt of gratitude will then have been imposed upon the German people, and musicians generally, by the eminent Leipzig firm, the number of whose standard editions of the works of great masters

The high appreciation which Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's compositions have repeatedly met with at the hands of German audiences appears to be extended likewise to his most reaudiences appears to be extended likewise or heaves of the cent production, viz., the violin Concerto, played for the cent time at the recent Birmingham Festival by Señor Pablo first time at the recent Birmingham Festival by Señor Pablo Serveste to whom it is dedicated. This eminent de Sarasate, to whom it is dedicated. violinist has now introduced the new and important work of our gifted countryman at two prominent concert institutions of Germany—viz., the Museum, at Frankfurt, conducted by Herr C. Müller (on the 9th ult.) and the Gürzenich, at Cologne, under direction of Professor Wüllner (20th ult.), with a result in each case which could not be otherwise than gratifying to both composer and executant. With reference to the Cologne performance, a correspondent writes: "The Concerto excited much interest among both artists and public, and its success was as complete as could possibly be expected from a new work which is not easily understood on a first hearing." We may add that the Gürzenich Concerts have greatly changed their former exclusive aspect since Professor Wüllner being now freely included in the programmes.

Referring again to a paragraph contained in our last Notes, concerning Anton Rubinstein, we learn that the eminent pianist has given a series of Historical Pianoforte Recitals during last month, at Berlin, which he will repeat at Vienna, Paris, and finally at London. The following is the programme set down for the first two Concerts—viz., First Concert: "The Carman's Whistle" (William Byrd), "The King's Hunting Jig" (J. Bull), "La Tenebreuse," "Le Reveil Matin," "La Favorite." "Le bavolet flottant," "La Bandoline" (Couperin); "Le Bavolet nottant, La Bandonne (Couperin); Le Rappel des Oiseaux," "La Poule," Gavotte et Variations (Rameau); "Katzenfuge," Sonata, A major (Scarlatti); Fantaisie Chromatique, Préludes et Fugues, Sarabande, Gavotte, Fugue, E minor (J. S. Bach). Variations: "The Harmonious Blacksmith," Sarabande, Passacaille, Gigue, Harmonious Blacksmith," Sarabande, Passacaille, Gigue, Airs et Variations (Handel); Rondo, "La Xenophone," "Sybille," "Les Langueurs Tendres," "La Complaisante" (Ph. E. Bach); Thème et Variations (Haydn); Fantasia, C. minor; Rondo, A. minor; Gigue, "Alla turca" (Moeart). Second Concert: Sonatas, Op. 27, 31, 53, 57, 90, 101, 109, and 111 (Beethoven). The third Concert is devoted to Schubert, Weber, and Mendelssohn; the fourth, to Schusens, he fish, et his control of the control of t mann; the fifth, to the various pianoforte virtuosi of our century—viz., Clementi, Field, Hummel, Moscheles, Henselt, Thalberg, and Liszt; the sixth, to Chopin. The interesting and instructive series closes with a seventh Concert, in which a selection from the representative Russian composers is given.

The serious rivalry (to which we alluded somewhat incredulously, as looming in the distance, in our last number) which threatens to affect the market value of the genuine Cremona violin, bids fair to become a reality. At any rate, the following deliberate opinion of an expert society con-cerning the merits of the latest discovery in violin making, should gladden the hearts of all the votaries of that instrument who do not already possess the much-coveted Amati-or Stradivari. Professor Alsleben, as chairman of the Berlin Tonkünstler-Verein, says:—"At a meeting held by this Society on the 9th ult., Herr Otto Lessmann submitted for examination three violins, constructed from the wood of the American spruce tree (abies balsamea). Two of these had been made in America, and the third by Herr Patzelt, of Dresden. The result of the trial has been an exceedingly favourable one, the unanimous opinion of the numerously attended meeting (including several specialists) being, that the instruments in question are infinitely superior to any others, even the best, of modern construction, and that, in fact, they may bear comparison with the mature specimens of the old masters. The German-made instrument, more especially, was considered to excel, by its grand and noble tone, its capacity for expressing nuances, and its easy response to the bow. The violins were tested, among others by Herr Emile Sauret, Professors de Ahna, and Aulin. It may be added that Herr Lessmann, the promoter of the investigation, is the editor of the Allgemeine Musikzeitung, and that one of the new violins was used at a recent Concert by Mdlle. Teresina Tua, in alternation with her own Amati, when even connoisseurs expressed a difficulty in distinguishing one from the other.

The Neue Berliner Musikzeitung says: "A keen competition is being raised concerning the possession of the violoncello used by the Servais', father and son, a Stradivari, the value of which is estimated at 100,000 francs. It had been presented to Franz Servais on one of his visits to St. Petersburg by the Princess Yousoupoff, in the possession of whose family it had been for a great many years previous. The finely ornamented instrument is inscribed: 'Antonius Stradivarius Cremonensis, 1701.' Much interest is being displayed in musical circles as to the ultimate destination of this violoncello, which the Paris Conservatoire is as eager to acquire as are certain private individuals at Berlin, London, and St. Petersburg." The highest offer hitherto made and refused by the widow of its late possessor (Joseph Servais) is said to have emanated from a member of the Mendelssohn family, at Berlin-viz., 60,000 francs, or £2,400 sterling.

The Germans are gifted beyond any other nation in discovering occasions for celebrating a jubilee. Thus, we succeeded the late Ferdinand Hiller in the conductorship, modern works of various schools and progressive tendencies Jubilee": "On January 20th, 1886, thirty-five years will have elapsed since Albert Lortzing, the amiable composer of 'Czar und Zimmermann,' 'Der Waffenschmied,' 'Undine,' and other melodious works, has ceased to be amongst the living. It is the intention in musical circles to commemorate this anniversary of the death of the popular composer in a worthy manner, and at the same time to start a fund for the erection of a monument to his memory." Let the memory of one of the chief representatives of genuine German Comic Opera be kept green, by all means! But might not the "Jubilee" have been deferred fifteen years until the fiftieth anniversary was completed? And had not the collection of funds for a monument, too, better be delayed until that to the infinitely more "melodious" and far more deeply "popular" composer of "Freischütz" has been erected at his native Eutin. and the subscriptions for which are still in such sore need of being multiplied? Weber's will indeed be a genuine jubilee in December next year—viz., the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. We really think the Lortzing Celebration might stand over for a few more seasons!

On the 8th ult. Dr. Reinecke, the well-known composer and musical director of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his appointment at that famous institution. The occasion was marked by many tokens of the esteem in which the eminent musician is held; both on the part of the Gewandhaus authorities, the directors of the Conservatorium (of which he is one of the professors), and private persons. The first of the annual series of Concerts at the Gewandhaus took place on the same day, when the programme consisted entirely of compositions by the Conductor—viz., Overture, "Res severa verum gaudium"; Concert Air, "Almansor"; Pianoforte Concerto, No. 3, C major; Impromptu for two pianofortes on a theme from Schumann's "Manfred"; Cantata, "Belsazar," for soli, chorus, orchestra, and organ. The last-named work (Anglicé "Belshazzar") is but little known, and is said to have pleased greatly.

orchestra which his bâton had rendered famous, Herr Hermann Mannsfeldt, formerly of Dresden, is now conducting the annual Concerts at the Berlin Concert-Haus, which commenced on the 1st ult.

The annual prize of the Berlin Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Fund, for composition, has just been awarded to Herr Georg Stolzenberg, a pupil of Professor Bargiel, and that for violin playing to Fräulein Wietrowetz, of Graz, pupil of

A special musical performance was held on the 11th ult., at Berlin, in memory of Friedrich Kiel, whose death we recorded in our last number.

An Overture, composed by Frederick the Great, has lately been unearthed under the auspices of the German Crown Prince, who caused it to be performed by the band of the Grenadier Regiment of which he is the commander. The great monarch, as is well known, was not only a proficient on the flute, but a very fair musician otherwise. The Overture, with amplified instrumentation, is about to be published at Berlin.

The two-hundredth performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" took place on the 1st ult., at the Berlin Opera. Herr Albert Niemann, successful as ever, sang the title

Much interest is just now being elicited in German musical circles by the violin-playing of the Sisters Milanollo, aged fifteen and eleven respectively. These gifted children are related to the two sisters of the same name who some forty years ago excited the admiration of all Europe by their marvellous proficiency on the same instrument at a similarly early age. Of the two latter, one, Teresa Milanollo, is still living, her younger sister, Maria, having died when only sixteen, and their fame is now being revived in the talent of their young relatives. The director of the Stuttgart Hof-Theater has "discovered" a primo tenore in the person of one Herr Baluff, who for no less than fifteen years has been a member of the chorus at that establishment. The singer has just made his débût as a soloist in the rôle of Manrico in "Trovatore," amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience, and as a result thereof has been engaged in a leading capacity at the institution with which he has been so long associated in a humble sphere.

Upon the retirement of Dr. Robert Franz from his official position at the university of Halle, last month, the enjoyment for life of his full salary has been granted to the veteran musician in recognition of his distinguished services to that institution and to German art generally.

A "Franz Liszt Society" has just been formed at Leipzig for the purpose of familiarising the general public with the more important later productions of the veteran pianist-composer.

Weber's resuscitated opera "Sylvana," in the version of Herren Lanner and Pasqué, already referred to in our Notes, is making the round of German opera establishments, and has just been most successfully produced at the Frankfurt Stadt-Theater.

In recent numbers of the Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, Herr Wilhelm Tappert discusses the much-vexed question respecting the composer of the National Anthem. His articles are interesting chiefly as showing the widespread and various use which has been made of the air at different periods in Germany, and as such repay perusal. The same journal also publishes a resumé of some lectures recently given at Berlin on "English organs and organ music," by Herr Otto Dienel, in which some highly favourable views are expressed as regards the relative progress of organ-building in this country.

Antonin Dvorak's opera, "Der Bauer als Schelm," is to be produced in January next at the Imperial Viennese Opera. This interesting work, although frequently heard at Prague, in the Bohemian language, has hitherto been performed in German only at the Dresden Hof-Theater.

Gluck's "Alceste" was revived on the 4th ult. at the Vienna Opera, where the work was first produced in 1767, and was last heard (at the Burg-Theater) in 1810. It will therefore have appeared as a novelty to Viennese audiences, as indeed it would to those of almost every other European capital.

Johannes Brahms has completed his fourth Symphony, which was to be performed for the first time, on the 25th ult., at a Concert of the Hofcapelle at Meiningen.

A "Systematic chronological catalogue of the works of Richard Wagner" will shortly be published from the pen of an industrious amateur, the possessor of a copious collection of Wagneriana—Herr Nicolaus Oesterlein, of Vienna.

The first volume of a standard edition of the works of great Belgian composers, consisting of Grétry's opera "Richard Cœur de Lion," has just been published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, and will be followed by the same composer's opera "Lucile." This interesting series is being issued at the expense of the Belgian Government, M. Gevaert, the director of the Brussels Conservatoire, being the chief editor.

The Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, will in future be styled Théâtre de l'Opera, since the adjoining Mint (from which it took its name) has had to make room for a new post-office.

At the Paris Opéra Comique Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile du Nord" was revived on the 7th ult. with much success, and continues to attract, in alternation with Bizet's popular

" Carmen."

Mdlle. Krauss has resigned her engagement at the Paris Grand Opera, in consequence, it is said, of a disagreement with the directors, and her resignation has been accepted in a letter written in most flattering terms by M. Ritt. It appears, however, that the lady's contract with the opera would have expired at the end of the present year, and that its renewal on the part of the present directors was a very doubtful matter. It is rumoured that Mdlle. Krauss will now be secured by M. Carvalho, for the part of Elsa in his long looked-for performance of "Lohengrin."

M. Léo Délibes is engaged upon a new Opera, the libretto of which is founded upon Auguste Magnain's romance " La belle Gabrielle."

M. Carvalho, the director of the Paris Opera Comique, was present last month at a performance of Wagner's "Lohengrin" at Vienna, by which he will be guided in his forthcoming production of the work in the French capital.

Dr. Hans von Bülow has been appointed Conductor of the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Concerts during the approaching season. The pianist-composer will proceed to the Russian capital towards the end of this month, in time for the first series of these Concerts, in some of which he will also take part in his capacity of virtuoso.

A monument in marble is to be erected over the grave of the late Dr. Damrosch, the energetic promoter of the German Opera in New York. Herr Helbig, of Dresden, has been entrusted with the execution of this memorial.

The death is announced at Vienna, on the 24th ult., after a short illness, of Baron Leopold Hofmann, Intendant-General of the Imperial Court Theatre, Vienna.

TIME-SIGNATURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I observe a paragraph in THE MUSICAL TIMES for October in which the important subject of time-signatures is mentioned, and a desire expressed for a simple method of indicating the grouping of the notes in compound time. Will you permit me to inform your readers that twelve years ago I ventured to put forth a suggestion for a new and simplified table of time-signatures in a recombination which I published, jointly with the Rev. R. F. Dale, in the Clarendon Press Series. Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett thought so well of the suggestion that they published the and simplified table of time-signatures in a Music Primer, table in their "Dictionary of Musical Terms.

In case you may think it worth while to publish the table, I send a copy of it with this letter. It will be seen at once that the particular point you lay just stress upon has been considered and provided for.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully, J. TROUTBECK. Westminster, October 1, 1885.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-Permit me to correct a typographical error which has crept into the quotation from Bishop Hall's "Art of Divine Meditation," the word "consort "being erroneously printed "comfort."

The passage, correctly rendered, possesses a certain historical value (irrespective of the question whether or not it refers to Thomas or Michael Este), inasmuch as it appears incidentally to confirm the statements of historians in regard to the high class of music actually performed in this country during the last years of Queen Elizabeth and the reign of James I., and is thus in the nature of an "undesigned coincidence." The "consort" mentioned by the excellent author was in all probability a performance of concerted chamber music for instruments, the rapid progress made in the cultivation of which class of music progress made in the cultivation of which class of fitting was a distinguishing feature of the development and practice of the art during the period above mentioned. See Mr. Chappell's "Popular Music of the Olden Time," Vol. I., p. 244, et seq., and Messras. Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms," title "Consort."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, JOHN GITTINS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I take the liberty of troubling you with a line in reply to Mr. Froggat's letter in your September number. By the expression "one scale" I intended to convey one major scale. I was speaking of the emergence of clear tonality-of the appearance of music so based as to impress in every part the feeling of a single centre or standard of comparison as regards pitch, for the time being.' foundation of this music is the major scale, with its harmonic enchainment. The salient features of this enchainment, it is scarcely necessary to say, are the major chords of the subdominant tonic and dominant. It is because as an exhaustive basis of lucid effect there is no comparison between the major and minor scales, that I did not use the term major. Besides its possession of the three chords above mentioned, of which the close relation of the first and third to the second strengthens so materially the feeling of the tonic, the major scale, as we all know, is invariable. The minor scale, on the other hand, is certainly variable, or, in other words, has several forms, Thus, the form which Mr. Froggatt, in common with many musicians, appears to consider the minor scale, is referred to by Helmholtz as the instrumental form. It may be said that only in virtue of lineaments borrowed from the major scale does the minor scale become the basis of clear tonality. These considerations may explain my omission of the term major. Yours very truly, Joseph Goddard.

THE COMPOSER OF "ST. KEVIN."-THE HEREFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

· SIR,-In your recent notice of the above Festival, your correspondent has fallen into the error of describing the composer of the Cantata "St. Kevin" as the Organist of the Roman Catholic Cathedral, Dublin.

Permit me to say, through the medium of your useful journal, that the duties and responsibilities of that office are the sole concern of—Yours very faithfully,

A QUESTION FOR VIOLONCELLISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-I have a remarkably fine toned violoncello, of superior form and finish, the name stamped inside, thus-F. Fillement.

A. Cremone.

I am unable to learn anything of this maker. Could you or any of your readers kindly give me any information respecting this maker? The instrument was an old one when purchased by a member of my family forty years ago. An answer will oblige.-Yours faithfully

G: Smart's Andante in F; and Meyerbeer's Coronation March.

CHELTERHAM.—The Harvest Festival at All Saints', on September 29, was probably the most successful ever held at this beautiful church, the decorations being most ornate and chaste, and the music remarkably well executed. The service commenced with the Processional Hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come," and included Special Fealms from A. H. Brown's Pealter, Magnifect and Nunc dimittis (Stainer) in E flat, and the anthems "In splendour bright" and "The heavens are telling" (Creation), conducted by Rev. G. Gardner, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the priest in charge. The preacher was the Rev. Canon Morse, Vicar of St. Mary's, Nottingham. Special hymns were sung, and the Service concluded with Goss's fine Festival setting of the Te Deum in F. The choir (numbering nearly fifty voices) and clergy were arranged cruciform in the centre of the chancel, and facing eastwards. Mr. von Holst accompanied throughout in the most able manner, and played several voluntaries after the Service.—An interesting ceremony took place at All Saints' Vicarage on the evening of the 9th ult., when Mr. von Holst, organist and choirmaster of All Saints' Church, was presented with a handsome andique the pediments and plasts per part fitted with stained glass in by pediments and plasts per part fitted with stained glass in bold relief, after Albert Durer. SPOHR ADJUSTABLE CHIN-HOLDER

GREATLY IMPROVED MAKE. REDUCED PRICES. PATENTED IN ALL COUNTRIES.

The ORCHESTRA of November 1, 1884, says:—
"No matter what state of proficiency a violinist may be in, he will largely benefit by the adoption of the 'Spohr Holder.'"

"The MUSICAL STANDARD of November 1, 1884, says:—
"Any violinist who adopts the "Spohr Holder" will soon discover that he has increased command over the instrument, and can descend from the higher to the lower position with much greater dexterity and certainty than was possible without it."

Mons. P. SAINTON writes:—
"It must be a great help and comfort to the player in improving the position of the violin under the chin, and giving him more freedom in shifting."

BERTHOLD TOURS, Esq., writes:—
"I consider it a most important and valuable help to violin players, and shall take every opportunity to recommend it.'

Sir GEORGE ELVEY writes:—
"I would strongly advise all violinists to use the 'Spohr Adjustable Chin-holder,' from which they, like myself, will derive every possible advantage and comfort."

J. M. FLEMING, Esq., Author of "Old Violins and their Makers," writes:—

"No violinist possessing one of these rests need have the slightest trouble in properly holding his instrument."

REDUCED PRICES.

"CONCERT" & "PROFESSOR" VIOLINS.

MESSRS. RIVIERE and HAWKES beg to inform Professors of the Violin, and Players generally, that they have made an arrangement with one of the best French Violin Makers to manufacture for them, specially, two NEW STYLES of Violin, to be named as above. Messrs. RIVIERE and HAWKES believe that they are supplying a long-felt want in introducing these instruments to the Musical Public, for, up to the present, it has been almost impossible to buy a really good and carefully made Instrument suitable for Orchestral and Solo Playing at a moderate price; those in the market being mostly cheap French or German copies, roughly made, and of no real value. The Instruments we now bring forward are carefully made by experienced workmen, some of whom have gained their knowledge in the workshop of the celebrated maker J. B. VULLAOME. This will at once establish the fact that these instruments are worthy of attention.

They are carefully made on the lines of the great Italian makers, and there is no doubt that they will increase in value if care and attention is bestowed on them. In appearance they are quite new, and remarkably handsome, a new oil varnish, which the maker has invented, being exclusively used on these Instruments.

READ THIS NOTICE.

Kindly write for full particulars.

One great and very valuable arrangement in AINS-WORTH'S NEW PATENT is an arrangement which allows the tone of Pedals to be changed from p to ff and vice versa by simply drawing out a stop. The special C.O. Pedals are arranged with a loud and soft Redal (like the Pianoforte). Other equally great advantages are secured in Ainsworth's just completed Patent.

Note.—Ainsworth supplies only the very best goods; and the great superiority of his Patent Organ Pedal Attachments for Pianofortes, and all similar keyed instruments, is due exclusively to his untiring study and his determination to give to Organists and Organ Students a real boon. AINSWORTH holds the first Patent granted for Organ Pedal Attachments and his constant study has provided means for organ Pedal practice.

AINSWORTH'S NEW LIST

CONTAINS ILLUSTRATIONS of his New PATENT (just completed) attached to Horizontal Grand and Upright Grand and Cottage Pianofortes in various styles. Write for NEW List.

New List contains illustrations of his New Patent attached to Harmoniums and American Organs. Organists and Organ Students will find AINS-WORTH'S Organ Pedal Attachments of real value.

New List contains illustrations of his Patent Modifying Arrangement by which the TONE of the Pedals is changed from LOUD to SOFT, and vice versa, by the movement of a Stop, or by two Modifying Pedals arranged with the Organ Pedals.

AINSWORTH'S New List contains illustrations of his Patent Independent Sliding Levers, which absolutely prevent sticking, and Sliding Adjustable Stickers.

New List contains illustrations of his Patent Centre Pin, which absolutely prevents sticking and gives a perfect round and steady movement to Pedals and Action otherwise unattainable, &c., &c.

NEW WORK.

A RRANGEMENTS for the ORGAN. By W. J. WESTBROOK, Mus. Doc. This work has been designed to meet the wants of those Organists who have to play organs more or less incomplete. The whole of the pieces may be played, therefore, upon organs with two keyboards; many of them, by a little management, upon organs with only one. The pedal is, of course, indispensable. It has been the aim to make all the pieces thoroughly playable, and as easy as was consistent with their due effect.

> Saturday night at sea. Duncan at Camperdown. Rodney and De Grasse. From sea.

A wife's song.
The winds, inconstant ever.
Old Benbow.

There's nothing like a smoke.

The seaboy's dream.
A song of the sea.
The wife for a British sailor.
We roam and rule the sea.
The homeward watch.

Off to sea.
A mother's song.
Here we sit by our Christmas fire.
A Christmas song.
Outward bound.
Herrings are in the bay.

Trafalgar.
Would you be a sailor's wife.
A fisher-wife's song.
Nay, never cry, lass.
A kiss to take to sea. The Apparition.
The Dutchman's broom.
Take me, lass, for life.
The fine old English admiral, Ring, happy bells. The forsaken.

The sailor's dream, Rooke in the Bay of La Hogue.

A thousand leagues away. Strike, and strike hard. Were I that gull. Hawke in Quiberon Bay. With Illustrated Cover and Engraved Portrait of H.R.H.

RUTH

Words by EDWARD OXENFORD Music by ALFRED R. GAUL.

""Ruth' is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject... One of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression... Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number... A choral, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybrack,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesistation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxenford and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we believe that when the Ruth Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to advancing societies. "—Birmingham Daily Gaxetit.

advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazsite.

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maddens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and melodious joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous welcome of Boaz.

... The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rojice, for blessings round us fall,' which will bear comparison with anything Mr. Gaul has written. An effective fugal passage carefully worked out, but not overdone, is inserted between strains of joyful acclamation of considerable freshness and vigour."—Birmingham Weekly Dari.

"Ruth has been set to music by several composers; none, how-ever, has become so worthly popular as the Cantata under notice. Although somewhat simple in parts, it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."— South Wills Express.

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.

"A good sound musical work is this "Holy City." I have no hesitiation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour sot only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr Gault."—Dulty Telegraph.

"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantaix must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standard.

"The Holy City' is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a scared character."—Musical Times.

"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr Gaul and to his "Holy City" cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birminglam Daily Gazetie.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Mr. Prout has followed closely the lines laid down by the classical nasters, having first turned a deaf car to the counsels of their successors. The result is that we have a new symphony perfectly class a form, so constructed as that the relation of the ready is constructed as that the relation of the various powers of the steady discovered, and so goes places and put to a legitimate use, these are great net. Following the oldest form, Mr. Prout begins with, and more appear when the symphony and adependent introduction, developed at some length, and an adependent introduction, developed at some length, and sicily are easily discerned. The principal subject is worked out in shiely the castly discerned. The principal subject is worked out in site a joyous mood, but always in scholarly fashion. Greater grace and melodiousness mark the second subject, the contrast being admiritially suitable, and accentuated in the course of the movement, while are typings from the judicious employent of demonstrated of the movement is a result of the province of the movement with the condition of the movement is a register of the strings and wind, as well as from the act of the movement is a condition of melody not ususgestive of enhabert, both in this. Mr. Prout has written this larghetto lovingly, and with keen sympathy for the various means employed. The character of the movement is fairly uniform, but it never becomes mononous, owing to the amplitude of the composer's resources. For derived detail in the third movement, an intermezzo in the Spanish tyle, we find abundant fancy of the most delicate and dainty anture, it words can convey an idea of this piece, which is destined to become favourite whenever heard. Its characteristic beauty, I should add, is tended by the highest technical finish. Power the comes convex and the contract of the composer's resources.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Those who are acquainted with Mr. Prout's two former Sympho-ies, and with his other thoughtful and finished works, will be glad to earn that his third Symphony is as masterly in construction and as duniable in detail as either of its brethren. The third movement, Intermezzo a PEspagnole, is singularly engaging."

WEEKLY DISPATCH.

"Though in the matter of scoring his Symphony is essentially nodern, yet in the flow of the music it is as straightforward as that of laydn and Mozart. It is also full of brightness and vigour, and ertain to make a favourable impression at the first hearing, because he audience will follow it with ease."

SPECTRE'S BRIDE

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

The English Version by the Rev. J. TROUTBECK, D.D., from the Poem by K. J. ERBEN

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

ANTONÍN DVOŘÁK.

Paper cover, 3s.; paper boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 5s. Vocal parts, 1s. 6d. each.

Full Score, £3 3s.; Orchestral Parts, £2 8s.

THE TIMES.

"The difficult subject selected, Herr Dovrák has attacked with the conscientiousness of a true artist. He accepts all the consequences of its gruesome tale. Character is his first object, beauty a secondary consideration; for all the incidents of the spectral night march he endeavours to find musical equivalents, not avoiding even those effects of bold realism where the terrible borders on the comic. The bells of the midnight chime and of the funeral knell resound in his orchestra, and when the cock crows in the morning we hear his voice as plain as possible in the flute and oboce. . . . His instrumentation more especially is full of the most startling surprises, which defy description. . . Enthusiastic applause at the end of the performance was with such a work and such a rendering a foregone conclusion."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Antonin Dvorák is now more destined than ever to be the composer who combines in himself the highest qualities of his art. What his symphonies and his 'Stabat Mater' proclaimed, 'The Spectre's Bride' affirms and proves beyond possibility of cavil. I remember saying of the 'Stabat Mater' that it was abrolutely original and absolutely great. Now we have another composition of the same character to demonstrate that the first was no 'fluke', and that the qualities named are really an outcome from the absolute originality and greatness of the author. ... As the story went on, and the grasp of the powerful music tightened, something like excitement began to paryade the hall. This increased moment by moment, till every number was followed by loud applause, which reached a tremendous climax. At the end Herr Dvorák had again and again to appear a mid a tempest of cheers', the natural expression of genuine feeling."

STANDARD.

"This evening the production of Herr Dvorák's Cantata 'The Spectre's Bride' created quite a sensation, moving the Festival audience to a stronger declaration of approval than had yet been evinced. Never was applause more fairly earned by the executants, and never did a composer win a more richly merited triumph... Enthusiasm such as was bestowed upon 'The Spectre's Bride' has colom been heard at Brimingham; and the composer, who conducted received greating at the close that will still ring in his ears when he returns home to Prague."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Dvorák's music is powerfully dramatic, there is no lack of melody in the vocal parts, and the instrumental and choral writing is as fine in its way as are the same departments in the composer's magnificent 'Stabat Mater.'"

ATHENÆUM.

"Of the music it is quite impossible in words to convey any adequate idea. Whatever we may say will appear weak to those who have heard the work, and exaggerated to those who have not. The task which the readily be understood, one of no ordinary difficulty. That he has passed triumphantly through the ordeal, that he has been able through out a cantatal asizing more than an hour and a half in performance to keep the attention of the audience at the highest stretch, without inducing the slightest feeling of weariness or monotony, is an achievement of which he may well feel proud. . . A well-known musician remarked during the performance, "The man is a magician!" and we heartily endorse the statement."

SUNDAY TIMES.

"As soon as the audience began to get interested applause came frequently, and at the end their enthusiasm knew no bounds. Cheers burst forth again and again, and the triumph of the composer-conductor was such as he will not readily forget. In a word, "The Spectre's Bride met with a great and unalloyed success."

THE TIMES.

"It would lead too far to follow the composer into all the details of his thoughtful and carefully developed work. Some of the most striking and successful points should, however, be specified. Prominent among these is the prelude to the first scene of the Cantata, with which a tenor song is intervoven. The structure of this piece betrays the accomplished workman, the Allegrovinace being especially remarkable for its powerful rhythmical accents, which carry the hearer along with them as in a current of impassioned melody. . . The work was received with vociferous applause, and there is every reason to think that its success will be a permanent one."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Unquestionably, a good story is here, and well set out for musical treatment. In these respects the composer could hardly have been served better, and Mr. Cowen may consider himself fortunate. ... No one acquainted in ever so slight a degree with the distinctive atlent of Mr. Cowen can be surprised to hear that he has treated the subject of 'Sleeping Beauty' with great success. The composer of the 'Language of the Flowers' is master of a dainty and delicate art peculiarly fitted for such incidents as those above set forth. It enables him, by slight and graceful touches, to make his music serve every picturesque and suggestive purpose. . . The orchestration is never involved and confusing, while its colouring often suggests rather the French than the modern German school."

STANDARD.

"This evening the first novelty of the Festival was presented in Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata 'Sleeping Beauty', given with the most emphatic success under the bôthen of the composer, who herein has followed up a notable list of successes with a work so fresh, ingenuous, and sparkling that it is likely to add the crowning laurel to his reputation. . . 'Sleeping Beauty' contains all the elements of a permanent popularity, and it will assuredly go the rounds of the choral societies without loss of time. A more emphatic triumph has seldom, if ever, greeted the composition of a native musician, Mr. Cowen was not only vociferously cheered by the audience, choir, and orchestra, but was summoned back to the platform amid a renewed outburst of applause. The Cantata is a valuable addition to the library of English music."

DAILY NEWS.

"The Cantata was enthusiastically received throughout, several of the numbers having been greatly applauded, especially the orchestral interlude suggestive of 'Maidenhood and Dreams of Love'; the opening chorus of the first scene; the Prince's scena 'Light, light at last,' and the final duet for the Prince and the Princess. The composer, who conducted the performance, was loudly cheered at its close. Mr. Cowen's Cantata is a work of exceptional merit, and will no doubt soon receive repetition in many quarters."

DAILY CHRONICLE.

DALLY CHRONICLE.

"Every page of the score is instinct with grace and refinement, whilst in the vocal portions—choral or solo—there is not a bar that is ungrateful to the singer. Mr. Cowen's style is popular—better still, it is agreeable and thoroughly English—and he acts wisely in adhering it. I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Cowen has written nothing more melodic, nothing more elegant, and nothing more sustained in its musical interest than his delicate setting of the fascinating fairy tale which formed the chief item of the Concert to-night. . . He possesses the priceless gift of melody—not the melody that comes by 'fits and starts' and then finds its outcome in short themes—but the broad-flowing tunefulness that seems to gather strength as it novergeases."

ATHENÆUM.

"The composer has an apparently exhaustless fund of graceful melody. He has written nothing more charming and refined than the opening chorus of fays in the present work, 'Draw the thread, and weave the wood,' or the orchestral interfued descriptive of maidenhood, which may compare with the best parts of his 'Language of the Flowers'. His instrumentation is delicate, varied, and full of fancy, adding not a little to the effect of the whole work. We have no hesitation whatever in predicting for 'Sleeping Beauty' a wide and deserved popularity."

CHALLEN & SON'S Iron-Frame Pianos

Have received the following Awards at the International Exhibitions of LONDON, 1862.—PRIZE MEDAL for "excellence of action and tone."

SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.—GOLD MEDAL for the best Pianette (the highest Award ever given for this class of Piano).

PARIS, 1878.—The MEDAILLE D'HONNEUR for "good and cheap Pianos" (great excellence combined with moderate cost).

MELBOURNE, 1881.—GOLD MEDAL for excellence of quality combined with solidity of construction.

TESTIMONIALS.

The Pianos manufactured by Messrs, Challen & Son are most satisfactory instruments.

Hawthorn Lodge, January, 1882.

Having used one of your Pianos a great deal for studying music as well as singing, I can with pleasure testify to the fact that they possess a very fine tone and sustain the voice admirably. I have used Pianos by all the leading manufacturers, but I consider your instruments fully equal in every respect to any made, and I shall take every opportunity of recommending them.

Yours truly,

MARIE ROZE.

Prima Donna of Her Majesty's Theatre.

I consider that Messrs. Challen & Son have succeeded in providing, at a most moderate cost, Pianos of high-class workmanship and pure tone. The instruments exhibited by Messrs. Challen & Son in Paris were highly creditable, not only to them but to the English Section.

JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., Hon. R.A.M., F.C.O., English Furor at the Paris Universal Exhibition, 1878.

The Pianos of Messrs, Challen & Son possess every good quality. They are exceedingly moderate in price, and I can testify, from personal experience, to their great durability.

GEORGE GARRETT, M.A., Mus. Doc., Cantab.

I can testify, in the strongest manner, to the qualities of the Pianos manufactured by Messrs. Challen & Son. In every point as to touch and tone they are excellent; and I can also certify, from experience, as to their durability under hard wear.

W. H. MONK,

Editor of Hymns Ancient and Modern.

I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. Challen & Son's Pianos. Their qualities of touch and tone can be at once stimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability. They are in my opinion unsurpassed if not unequalled.

ROCK OF AGES

(JESUS, PRO ME PERFORATUS)

The Latin Version by the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P. COMPOSED FOR

BARITONE SOLO, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc. Paper cover, 18.

"It is a scholarly piece of work for chorus and baritone solo (Mr. King), well written for the voices, and full of excellent counterpoint, occasionally relieved by flowing melody. Dr. Bridge was warmly applauded."—The Times.

"By his setting of the Latin hymn, the organist of Westminster Abbey has taken a decided step forward, and has warranted amateurs in hailing him as another vindicator of native talent."—Daily Telegraph.

"Dr. Bridge's setting of Mr. Gladstone's Latin version of 'Rock of Ages,' for bass voice, chorus, and orchestra, made a favourable impression upon admirers of the highest order of ecclesiastical music."—Standard.

"The writing is musicianly throughout, and in parts really bold and striking; it is scored, moreover, with a breadth and richness that prove Dr. Bridge to be a master of the resources of his art."—Sunday Times.

"Among the short works produced, Dr. Bridge's excellent setting of Mr. Gladstone's translation of the hymn 'Rock of Ages' deserves first mention. It is for baritone solo and chorus, and is conceived in a thoroughly original and most effective manner, and treated with very great skill. The last words, 'Dum hos artes, 'with the fine fugue to the words 'Mortuos cum stare jubes,' in which the splendid pedal point and augmentation should be noticed, is the climax of the work, after which the opening subject is resumed."—Guardian.

"The music—for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra—is very impressive in its expression of the serious sentiment of the text. It was conducted by the composer, and was received with deserved applause."—Daily News.

"In this short piece the talented organist of Westminster Abbey appears in a very favourable light. The composition is not only scholarly, but musically interesting, and well scored for the orchestra."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

HANDEL'S "MESSIAH."

ROBERT FRANZ has contributed so many original and beautiful gems to the realm of music, and has done such excellent service in editing and revising the works of other composers, that we naturally look for earnestness and truthfulness in all that he undertakes. It must, however, be confessed that in attempting to revise and restore Handel's "Messiah" he was illadvised. The result, as seen in the full score he has published in Leipzig, exhibits a complete failure. From the eminence and reputation of Franz, this is a great misfortune, for many earnest musicians, who have no opportunity of thoroughly investigating the matter, will be ready to accept his version as a sure and reliable guide. In a preface, Franz informs us that no authentic copy of the accompaniments added to Handel's "Messiah," by Mozart, is in existence, and that the first printed score in which they appear announced them as "after Mozart's arrangement"; it is probable that some of those accompaniments were the work of Adam Hiller, and that "these passages have given rise to dissenting opinions, as they contain unwarrantable alterations in Handel's original parts, which should have remained absolutely intact."

The words here italicised would naturally lead us to expect nothing but the most absolute fidelity to the composer's original intentions in the new score, particularly as Franz further states that "it has long been my desire to do everything in my power to remove these defects, but it can easily be conceived that I was prevented by a natural diffidence from touching a work which, in spite of these imperfections, has received for nearly a century the warmest admiration of the musical publics of Germany, England, and America. . . Resolving finally to sacrifice my personal unwillingness, I began in the first place by discarding those passages which could not possibly be ascribed to Mozart's authorship. While thus discarding and altering I had to rely entirely on my own judgment, as Mozart's original manuscript score has totally disappeared. With the exception of the Aria 'If God be for us,' I declare emphatically that I assume the whole responsibility of such alterations and omissions. I have completed them in closest harmony with the original style of Handel." After this statement we look anxiously to see what material Franz had to enable him to accomplish such a serious and important task; he tells us his authorities were: "1. The score published by Breitkopf and Härtel. 2. The score published by Peters, of Leipzig. 3. The edition of the London Handel Society. 4. Fac-simile of the autograph score of 'The Messiah,' by Handel."

In reading this list we at once discover the reason why Franz has so signally failed; of the abovementioned works the "fac-simile of the autograph score of 'The Messiah,' by Handel,' would naturally seem to be an authority above dispute, but unfortunately the so-called fac-simile is very imperfect; whether the printers were at great pains to remove all marks which were not to be found in ink in the original, or whether the photographic process was not capable of reproducing pencil marks, it is not possible to say; but the fact remains that many marks made in pencil by Handel himself are not shown, as, for instance, the elision of the sixth and ninth never have any trouble in executing the whole move-bars of the Symphony to "Ev'ry valley." Unfortument, and always secure an immense affect.

nately for Franz, his residence abroad prevented his comparing the fac-simile with the original, and still more unfortunately, he seems to have been ignorant of the existence of a manuscript of "The Messiah" partly in Handel's autograph and partly in the hand of his amanuensis, Smith. This manuscript known as the "Dublin" score was the one actually used by Handel in Dublin, and subsequently, when conducting the performances of "The Messiah." It contains, therefore, his revised and matured judgment, and must be accepted for performance in preference to the first score which he wrote in burning haste in twenty-five days. This Dublin copy which Handel used was succeeded by another, written by Smith. This is now preserved in the library at Hamburg. These are the authorities which should be consulted by any one desiring to give us Handel's text in its integrity, and it is much to be hoped that Dr. Chrysander will crown his Handelian labours by publishing a copy of "The Messiah" which will embody and show plainly all the revisions and alterations made by Handel himself. That he will do so, we are encouraged to hope, from the fact that he has so recently published a fac-simile of Handel's "Jephtha," which is apparently absolutely perfect.
The three scores of "The Messiah" were recently on loan at the Inventions Exhibition, thus affording an admirable opportunity for careful comparison, of which the writer of this article availed himself.

In England, where probably "The Messiah" is performed more often in one year than it has been in the whole 100 years in Germany, we have an unbroken tradition of Handel's manner of performing his Oratorio, and although we have since 1813 generally performed the work with Mozart's accompaniments, yet these have not been adopted in full; it has always been felt that in numerous instances Mozart's additions were not in sympathy with our Handel traditions. Take as instances the Overture and the Pastoral Symphony, which Franz prints with Mozart's additional accompaniments; by the omission of these at the repeats we get variety, and considerably more Handel.

To "Comfort ye," Mozart added nothing. Franz adds clarinets and bassoons, not with advantage. It may be noted that these instruments are almost constantly added by Franz throughout the work, even where they were omitted by Mozart; the result is a monotony of colour.

Franz has made the mistake of assigning "But who may abide" to a bass voice, whereas Handel expressly composed it for a contralto, writing the part in the C alto clef. The "Dublin" score contains this Air in his own autograph, with the name of the singer, Guadagni. Handel did write an Air for bass to the same words, but discarded it. The Chorus "And he shall purify," Franz prints for soli voices, and adds clarinets.

The Recitatives in "The Messiah" were rarely written with orchestral accompaniments by Handel. He generally simply indicated the harmony by a figured bass, and tradition says he accompanied these on the "harpsichord," an instrument of very evanescent sound, and wholly without means of sustaining holding chords. Yet, notwithstanding this, Franz has put the String Quartet for these accompaniments in all cases with sustained chords. In some places the harmonies would have a distressing effect when heard with the voice part.

The Chorus "For unto us" Franz prints for solo voices to commence, and to sing all the passages with divisions or fiorituri. Why? Is it because of the supposed difficulty? Here, in England, our choirs

The Air "Rejoice greatly" Mozart was content to score for strings only (Handel wrote only the first violin part), but Franz has added clarinets, bassoons, and horns, and, still more perversely, has composed a cadence for the end of the Air, made up out of certain Handel fragments. This cadence, set to the first syllable of unto, is as follows:-

The Recitative "Then shall the eyes" Franz gives to soprano, also the Air "He shall feed his flock," thus following the fac-simile of Handel's first score; but the composer's better judgment is to be found in his "Dublin" score, where the Recitative and Air are both transposed a fourth lower for an alto voice, the voice part being written in the proper C clef. Handel has written the names of two singers over "He shall feed "-Miss Frederick and Miss Young. The Air returns to B flat at "Come unto Him," and there Handel has written the name of Frasi as the singer. The Chorus "His yoke is easy," with the exception of the last eleven bars, Franz makes soli. To the Air "He was despised" Mozart added clarinets and bassoons, but these parts Franz has amplified and altered. In the twenty-seventh bar from the commencement Mozart had already committed a grievous outrage on Handel, who had most eloquently expressed intense grief by absolute silence. This stroke of genius Mozart spoilt by filling the heart-aching void with four chords of E flat on the wind instruments. Bad as this was, it can, at least, be said that the chords in themselves were simple, and the least obtrusive which could be found; but Franz has made matters worse by thrusting into the wind parts the short phrase which follows immediately afterwards in the voice at the words "He was despised"-a puerile bit of imitation one might expect to find in a schoolboy's exercise.

To the Chorus "And with His stripes" Franz has added clarinets and bassoons. Mozart was content to leave well alone, and let Handel speak for himself. The same may be said of the Chorus "He trusted in God"-in these and similar cases the filling up in Handel's day was allotted to the organ-Franz has printed an organ part, but of a very meagre descrip-The exquisite and touching Air "Behold, and see" Mozart left unaltered; Franz has spoilt it by adding clarinets and bassoons. These two numbers were written by Handel for a tenor voice, in the tenor C clef; Franz allots them to a soprano voice. So also the succeeding Recitative "He was cut off." and the Air "But thou didst not leave," written by Handel in the tenor clef for a tenor voice, are arbitrarily assigned to a soprano by Franz. Here a reference to the fac-simile score would have indicated the right course to pursue. Mozart gave the first Recitative and Air to the tenor, and the remainder to the soprano, possibly thinking the four numbers too fatiguing for one singer; but experience has shown that this is not the case, and the English (Handel) plan of a tenor singing the whole scene manifestly adds much to its consistency and com-To the Chorus "Let all the angels" pleteness. In the Air "The trumpet shall sound" Franz has adopted the shortened form given by Mozart in preference to that of Handel, in order to include the second part of the Air; by this curtailment Handel's trumpet part is reduced to insignificance, and is not by any means so acceptable to English audiences. It remains to be said that Franz includes in his score many of the numbers it is customary to omit in performance, some of which omissions are sanctioned by the usage of Handel himself. Nowadays we expect to get through a performance of "The Messiah" in about three hours. It is not possible to enter further into matters of minute detail, but enough has been said to show that Franz's score can never be accepted in England, and all will regret that so much preparation and painstaking has proved to be lost labour, or worse.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

It has already appeared that Bach was no traveller. He never put his foot outside the frontiers of Germany, differing, in that respect, from his great con-temporary, G. F. Handel, who early went down into Italy, to be largely influenced by the genius of that country's music. What changes might have come over Bach's style if, when young and impressionable, he had put himself in the same circumstances as Handel, can only be surmised. That the profound intellectuality of his music would have suffered we do not for a moment suppose. The nature of the man lay there, and was strong and sturdy enough for any amount of resistance. But it is probable that he would have paid the sincerest flattery to the beauty and vocal quality of Italian song by imitating it, as Handel did. In his later days he was very fond of what he called the "pretty tunes," and his acquaintance with the music of Vivaldi came to be as great, or perhaps greater, than that of any contemporary German. It is useless, however, to speculate. Bach, as we have said, remained at home all his life, keeping unimpaired the pure Teutonic quality of his art. As years rolled on, he became more and more disinclined to leave the shelter of his own roof. He went, on rare occasions, to Dresden during the Leipzig period, and once visited his native Thuringia. Erfurt, the frequent rendez-vous of the Bach family, also received him, and in May, 1747, he made a memorable journey to Berlin, where his son, Emanuel, was Capellmeister and accompanist to Frederic the Great. The story of Bach's interview with the flute-playing monarch has often been told, on the authority of Emanuel and also of Friedemann, who accompanied his father. It runs thus :-

"Just as the King was about to perform his flute solo (at the usual Palace Concert), a list was brought to him of the various strangers who had that day arrived. With his flute still in one hand, he glanced through the paper; he turned to the assembled band, saying, with some excitement, 'Gentlemen, old Bach has come!' His flute was laid aside, and Bach sent for at once to come to the château. He had put up at Emanuel's house, and was not even allowed time to assume his black Court dress: he had to appear at once in his travelling costume, just as he was. Friedemann tells us that his father, having apologised somewhat at length for the defiexcuses, and that then a conversation began between

The story reads well; but no more than to a sapper is anything sacred to the cold-blooded modern historian, who makes fables of our most cherished as any ever paid to him by persons of his own rank. traditions. Spitta says that it is an open question whether Friedemann did not draw upon his imagination for some of his facts, and quotes Spener's Zeitung, a newspaper of the period, in which, under date May 11, 1747, the following paragraph may be read :-

"His Majesty was informed that Capellmeister Bach had arrived in Potsdam, and that he was in the King's ante-chamber, waiting his Majesty's gracious permission to enter and hear the music. His Majesty at once commanded that he should be

With all deference to Herr Spitta, we do not see that the newspaper paragraph affects the credibility of Friedemann's story. It might even be incorporated therewith, and make a consistent whole. reporter concerned himself only with Bach's introduction to the King, which came fairly within the range of a Court Circular. The incident of the Concert may have been known to him, but it was as much as his ears were worth to publish it, for Frederic had a short and sharp method with the dealers in tittle-tattle. We see no reason, therefore, to reject the long-accepted narrative, or to question the truthfulness of Bach's sons. That the King desired Bach to try the Silbermann pianofortes then and there, and, on the next evening, asked him to extemporise a six-part fugue, which he did with perfect success, must be accepted with the rest of the narrative. But while the old musician astonished his auditors, he scarcely pleased himself. From his own point of view he might have treated the theme better, and, in fact, did so at leisure, dealing with it in the form of a fugue in three parts, and one in six, eight canons, a fugue with answer on the fifth in canon form, a sonata in four movements, and a two-part canon over a free basso continuo. These works he had engraved, and, as a "Musical Offering," dedicated them to Frederic in the following terms :-

'Most Gracious King:

"I herewith dedicate to your Majesty, with the deepest submission, a musical offering, of which the noblest portion is the work of your Majesty's illustrious hand. It is with reverential satisfaction that I now remember your Majesty's very special Royal favour, when, sometime since, during my stay in Potsdam, your Majesty condescended to play the theme for a fugue to me on the clavier, and at the same time graciously commanded me to work it out then and there in the Royal presence. It was my humble duty to obey your Majesty's command. But I immediately perceived that, for lack of due preparation, the performance was not so successful as so excellent a theme required. I accordingly determined, and at once set to work to treat this really Royal theme more perfectly, and then to make it known to the world. This undertaking I have now carried out to the best of my ability, and it has no end in view but this very blameless one-to exalt, though in only a trifling matter, the fame of a monarch, whose greatness and power must be admired and respected by all, and particularly in music as in all the other sciences of war and peace. I make so bold, therefore, as to add this most humble petition-that your Majesty will condescend to grant this present little work a gracious reception, and to continue to vouchsafe your gracious favours to your Majesty's most humble, obedient servant, - THE AUTHOR.-Leipzig, July 7, 1747."

Frederic must have been highly pleased with the compliment thus paid to him. He was a genuine admirer of Bach's talent, and probably saw in the "Musikalisches Opfer" an act of homage as welcome

On returning to Leipzig from Berlin, the master resumed his quiet life, and it does not appear that he left home at all during the three years that remained to him of his career.

These last days were agitated, if not embittered, by an angry controversy into which Bach was drawn by exalted ideas of his art. If truth must be told, he was rarely out of "hot water" long together. Even while the Ernesti quarrel was going on, he fought another enemy by deputy. This person— Johann Adolp Scheibe—is described as "a young man of knowledge and acumen, and a talented writer, but only a second-rate practical musician." He competed on one occasion for the organist's place at St. Nicholas, but failed, and ever afterwards persecuted Bach as the cause of his non-success, using for that purpose the columns of his own journal, Critische Musikus. This began, as far back as 1737, with an anonymous letter finding fault with Bach's compositions "for their lack of natural grace and pleasing character, for a turgid and confused style, and an extravagant display of learned art." The master appears to have taken no notice of this, so, a year later, Scheibe returned to the charge, saying, amongst other things: "Bach's church pieces are constantly more artificial and tedious, and by no means so full of impressive conviction or of such intellectual reflection as the works of Telemann and Graun." Bach took offence at this criticism, and, it is said, aimed an indirect blow at his assailant by representing him as Midas in the Cantata "The strife between Phœbus and Pan." But having Ernesti on his hands, he held back from a paper war, which he could the more afford to do because Birnbaum, one of his friends, and a professor at the University, took up the cudgels on his behalf. Scheibe and Birn-baum then had a lively and prolonged passage of arms, in which the aggressor was vanquished, as he afterwards confessed. With this, however, we have no concern.

The affair before alluded to as having agitated Bach's last days originated in a quarrel between a Cantor and a Rector, similar to that in which he himself engaged with Ernesti. Doles was the Cantor. Biedermann, a very learned person, the Rector, and Freiburg the place. When, in 1748, the Peace of Westphalia was signed, Biedermann determined to celebrate it by a Singspiel, words by Enderlein, a blind poet, music by Doles. The Singspiel, played for several days running in the Kaufhaus, proved a great success, and so much increased the influence and importance of Doles that the Rector became jealous. He even went so far as to attack music in his next report, asserting that the over-much practice of it is apt to lead the young astray into a life of dissipation, and going on to name certain persons of unsavoury reputation who, in former times, had devoted them-selves to the art. He quoted Horace, who puts musicians on a par with quacks and beggarly priests; declared that the early Christians excluded them from their religious meetings, only allowing them to take the sacrament once a year, and so on. This tirade naturally excited much sensation, and brought down upon its author's head the just anger of the whole musical community. Biedermann was promptly set upon by Mattheson and others; then people who sympathised with the Rector joined in, and so the wordy war went on. Bach, impulsive as ever, and more than ever jealous for his beloved art, keenly felt the injustice of Biedermann's language, under which it was impossible to remain passive. He, therefore, sent the Rector's pamphlet to his friend Schröter, at Nordhausen, asking him to write a reply. Schröter consented, and forwarded the MS. to Bach, who was so pleased with it, that immediate steps were taken to put it in print. In a letter to Einicke, the master wrote: "Schröter's review is well done and quite to my taste, and will shortly appear in print. Herr Mattheson's 'Mithridates' has caused a very violent commotion, as has been told me on trustworthy testimony. If yet some other refutations should follow, as I suspect, I make no doubt that the author's (Biedermann's) ears will be purged, and made more apt to hear music." Schröter's reply was entrusted by Bach for printing to a person who thought he could improve it. The tone of the article was not bitter enough for his taste, and he took the liberty of pouring in the required amount of gall, saying, amongst other things, that Biedermann was better acquainted with the writings of the heathen than with the word of God. When Schröter saw this amended version he naturally became very angry, and loud in his remonstrances. On his part, Bach wrote to Einicke: "Pray make my compliments to Herr Schröter till I am able to write to him, and I will then excuse myself with regard to the alterations in his review, though, in fact, I am not to blame in the matter at all, they are solely attributable to the person to whom I entrusted it to print." Schröter, however, continued to hold Bach responsible -- with very good reason -- and insisted upon a public explanation and apology. The rupture remained unhealed till Bach's death.

Meanwhile Bach retaliated upon Biedermann in precisely the fashion he adopted when Scheibe troubled him. That is to say, he had his "Strife between Phœbus and Pan" performed with sundry apropos alterations. One of the changes made is adduced by Spitta, according to whom the lines-

"And now, Apollo, strike the lyre again, For naught is sweeter than thy soothing strain,"

"Now strike the lyre with redoubled power, Storm like Hortentius, like Orbilius roar."

This was a hit at both Rectors, Ernesti and Biedermann; Orbilius-the schoolmaster in Horacerepresenting the latter, and Hortentius, Cicero's rival, the former. Biedermann's temper was not improved in consequence. He even talked about "the stupid lies proceeding from that foul Bach"at which we can imagine the Leipzig Cantor smiling complacently, assured that his satirical shaft had gone home. Nevertheless, it is to be regretted that Bach's last days were thrown into a turmoil by a stupid and unprofitable controversy. He should have kept his hands out of the puddle. But he did not, and in that he did not we have another proof of his combative nature, as well as of his jealousy on behalf of music.

All this time the master's end was rapidly approaching. But it did not find him unpreparing. While immersed in the affairs of the world, and, as we have seen, quite ready to lay about him for the cause that seemed right, he had an inner life which was calm and assured. Inborn, natural piety has been claimed for him, and must, we think, be allowed. In point of morals he led a blameless life. enemy could find a joint in his armour there, and it seems equally clear that his Christian faith was firm and sound. The catalogue of his library makes the fact pretty clear that religious books were his favourite reading. It includes eighty-three volumes books of the Reformation period, and books of sermons, including one of Tauler, the Dominican mystic. The German Pietists were also well represented in the library, which was that of a man sufficiently interested in religious questions to look at them from various points of view. As to Bach's knowledge of the Bible, Spitta says:—"We see from his owning Bunting's 'Itinerarium Sacræ Scripturæ' that he must have tried to realise the Bible history as vividly and as picturesquely as possible. In this Itinerary all the travels of the Patriarchs, Judges, Kings, Prophets, Princes and their peoples, of Joseph and the Virgin Mary, of the Wise Men from the East, Christ and His Apostles, were traced out and estimated in German miles; it also contains a full description of all countries and towns mentioned in the Bible. Judge as we may of the scientific value of such a work, it is, at any rate, an evidence that Bach did not regard his Bible merely as a repertory of texts for lyric verses, or even for dogmatic argument, but that he tried to make himself familiar with it in every sense." It is surely not rash to infer, from the general tone of available evidence, that Bach awaited his end with the calmness of a man fortified by religious faith.

Very little is known of Bach's last illness and the circumstances of his death; all the information collected by painstaking Spitta being conveyed in a single paragraph. His sight had for some time been gradually failing through over use, and became so bad in the winter of 1749-50 that Bach determined to seek the advice of an English oculist then resident in Leipzig. By this person two operations were performed, both of which failed, and the patient then became totally blind. Unhappily, even worse consequences resulted. The doctors of that day practised "heroic" treatment, and such was the strength of the drugs prescribed for Bach that his superb constitution broke down under them. The first breach in the fortress of life was thus made, and, as is often the case in like circumstances, surrender promptly followed. On July 18, 1750, the patient suddenly recovered his sight, and looked again on the world which he thought was never more to be visible. We can imagine the joy this event caused in the Cantor's house. It opened up a renewed future, into which Bach gazed, perhaps, with dreams of fresh achievement. Alas! it was only the "lightening before death." A few hours later apoplexy struck the master a mortal blow, and for ten days he lay helpless and in a high fever. Yet even that time, under those circumstances, was not wasted. He had been desirous of amending and perfecting an organ choral written some years before, and entitled "Lord, when we are in direst need." Thoughts of this work came to him on the death-bed, and he could not rest till the completion of his idea. Calling his son-in-law, Altnikol, he dictated the necessary changes, and then. with touching piety, altered the name of the choral to "Before Thy throne with this I come." So was his final effort devoted to the cause of religion, and at a quarter to nine o'clock in the evening of July 28, 1750, he departed to receive the reward of his labours, in presence of his wife and daughters, of his son, Christian, of Altnikol, and a pupil, Müthel.

The mortal remains of the illustrious master were interred on July 31, in the graveyard of St. John's Church, near the then existing city wall. Unhappily, the exact spot cannot now be ascertained, a roadway having been made through the enclosure, but it is supposed to be not far from the site of the present monument. All the scholars of St. Thomas followed their Cantor to the grave, and at a service subsequently of that class, among them being two complete held in the church the preacher announced: "The editions of Luther's works, sundry controversial very worthy and venerable Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, Hof-Componist to his Kingly Majesty of Poland, and Electoral and Serene Highness of Saxony, Capellmeister to his Highness the Prince of Anhalt-Cöthen, and Cantor to the school of St. Thomas in this town, having fallen calmly and blessedly asleep in God, in St. Thomas's churchyard, his body has this day, in accordance with Christian usage, been consigned to the earth." Record of the master's death may still be seen in the town registers. One reads, "1750, Friday, July 31, a man died aged 67, Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, Cantor of the Thomasschule, 4 children. Fees 2 thalers 14 groschen." Another, in the town library is worded thus: "A man, 67 years, Herr Johann Sebastian Bach, Capellmeister and Cantor to the school of St. Thomas, died at the school, and was buried, with a hearse, July 30 (sic), 1750." The words "with a hearse" are significant, the vehicle in question being used only at the funerals of distinguished persons. Bach's death does not appear to have disturbed the current of Leipzig life. The Musical Union performed a mourning ode; Telemann wrote a sonnet, and the deceased musician's colleague, Kriegel, celebrated him in a eulogium. As for the Town Council, whom Bach once fought so stoutly, their Magnificencies remarked, when next they met, that "the School needed a Cantor, and not a Capell-meister," and that "Herr Bach had been a great musician, but not a schoolmaster "-which, indeed, was perfectly true.

It is strange that so thoughtful a man as Bach made no will. Exemplary in every family relationship, he yet neglected to guard against a possible source of trouble, after his death, to those he loved best. As a matter of fact, some difficulties did arise about the disposal of the master's little property. The eldest sons came down upon their father's musical library like hungry wolves, and swept away the greater portion of it, including his precious manuscripts, which speedily became dispersed. An inventory of the remaining goods and chattels is still in existence and helps us to see into the great man's modest home with some measure of clearness. Note is also taken of his property in scrip and cash, from which we learn that he had a share in a mine, valued at 60 thalers; three bonds worth 65 thalers, coin to the amount of 231 thalers, and medals, tokens, &c., estimated at 25 thalers. His silver plate and kindred objects is valued at 251 thalers. Among the articles specified are two pairs of candlesticks, four snuff boxes, two gold rings, coffee and tea-pots, and nine drinking cups. The musical instruments, nineteen in number, are set down as worth 371 thalers. They comprise five clavecins, two lute-harpsichords, a Stainer violin, an ordinary violin, and a piccolo violin, three violas, a small bass viol, two violoncellos, a viola da gamba, a lute, and a little spinet. The articles in white metal, dishes, jugs, &c., are set down at 9 thalers, those in copper and pinchbeck, including three coffee-pots, two kettles, and three pairs of candlesticks, at 7 thalers, while the dead master's clothes and personal sundries are estimated to be worth 33 thalers. They include a silver court sword, a silver mounted walking stick, a pair of silver shoe buckles, a silk coat "somewhat worn," a mourning cloak, and a cloth coat. There are also eleven surplices not valued because they were "at the wash." It is clear that only a part of the house furniture went into the inventory—to wit, a chest of drawers, two linen pressers, a dozen black leather chairs and six others, a writing table with drawers, six tables, and seven wooden bedsteads. These were valued at 29 thalers. The library is carefully catalogued, and comprises seventy-four volumes, all on theological subjects, and, therefore, probably a selection only. They are set down as worth 38 honour.

thalers. The estimate of the entire property is 1,158 thalers 16 groschen-an amount which represents a much larger sum in present currency. From these interesting particulars we can gather that Bach lived in a state of modest dignity becoming his position. His household was that of a well-to-do burgher of the day-one able to afford more than necessaries, and to keep up a certain amount of hospitable

The property was divided amongst the widow and children, according to the terms of a deed still existing in the Leipzig archives. From it we gather that of the shares, bonds, and cash, the widow took a third, the remainder going to the children in equal portions. Unfortunately the debtors on two of the bonds are described as "not to be found." The ready money went to the payment of outstanding debts. Concerning the plate, &c., we read:—"In the interest, and with the consent of all concerned, the agate snuff-box, mounted in gold, is for the present withdrawn from among the valuables specified in Cap. V. and valued at 40 thalers, partly because it is a piece of property fit only for the collector and connoisseur, and partly because it is too valuable to be assigned by lot to either of the children, and until a purchaser can be found it is left in care of the widow." The document then refers to the musical instruments :- "The instruments specified under Cap. VI. (as they cannot be divided and as no purchaser offers) are also set aside, with the hope that they may be sold before Easter. . . But because Herr Joh. Christian Bach, the youngest son of the deceased, had received from his father during his lifetime three claviers with pedal, these have not been included in the specification, since he declares them to have been given to him as a present, and has brought witnesses to that effect, the widow and Herr Altnikol and Herr Hesemann having known of it. The guardian, however, finds something suspicious in the matter, as do also the children of the first marriage, but they refrain from urging their objections, and, on the contrary, the widow, the other heirs, and their representatives acknowledge and admit the gift." court sword was taken by Friedemann, who paid for it, and the linen, "by the unanimous consent of the seniors," went to the children under age. All the rest was disposed of in accordance with the rule giving the widow her third, and the children the remainder in equal parts.

It is much to be regretted that Bach's widow ultimately fell into poverty. As early as 1752, two years after her husband's death, she was selling musical relics, and receiving relief from the town. The obvious inference is that the children refused to help her. Some of them could have done so, and respect for their father's memory might have extended filial duty even to a step-mother. Poor Anna Magdalena lived till February 27, 1760, and then died in an almshouse. The place of her burial remains undiscovered, but it appears that "a quarter of the school"-her great husband's school-followed her remains to the grave.

But worse than the neglect of Bach's widow was the indifference shown by Germany to his music. Very soon after the illustrious master's death, his countrymen seem to have forgotten that he ever lived and worked among them. The whole land passed under the influence of Italian art and of German art Italianised. So it remained till Beethoven came and aroused in his countrymen a sense of their nationality in music. Then the old master was remembered, and one of his daughters—the youngest child, Regina Johanna-lived to see the dawn for her father of an endless day of fame and

By JOSEPH GODDARD.

It is both interesting and instructive to trace, in the classical instrumental movement, features of development having their prototypes in the choral structure. A feature of development common to the instrumental movement and the choral structure is the repetition of fragments of the subject. The following examples in these two different styles of music involve this feature of development:—

Another feature of the instrumental movement having its prototype in the choral structure, is the florid development of the subject. The prototype of this is the roulade of the chorus—

This form of development—the roulade—aided greatly the elaboration of choral music. It enabled the chorus to embrace a larger range of degrees of rapidity than would have been otherwise possible. A new melodic and rhythmic factor was thus available for purposes of construction—a factor of which Handel made important use.

Thematic treatment may be said to embrace all the various principles and modes of effect that have become unfolded in vocal music, and to re-present them in a larger combinative form, animated by a more comprehensive, if less definite, spirit. Thus the Symphony of Beethoven contains examples of the choral style in plain harmony, of imitative effect, of melody and accompaniment, of subject and free counterpoint, and of counter-melodic effect. But the particular applications of these principles are no longer necessarily confined to vocal range, or to the character or number of vocal partitions. The voices are the various instruments of the orchestra, and the constituent passages are correspondingly numerous and varied in character. From these circumstances it follows that we have, in the modern instrumental movement, some passages based upon vocal music, with a peculiar vocal melody; others having their prototypes in the accompaniment of vocal music, whilst the effect of rhythm has also greatly increased scope. There is thus not only a travelling further into the pure sound-world, but the stranger effects being combined and arranged on principles gathered from the vocal domain, the result has a certain dialectic character, with expression partly partaking of human utterance, partly of the unsentient world, and which is partly mystic. Thus the method of the modern tonepoet, like that of the primal priest, is anthropomorphic-he projects his shadows upon the tone-world as did the early priest of nature upon the then strange world of phenomena, giving to mystic echoes a likeness of human utterance, as dawning intelligence gave a human character to the then strange sounds and forms of nature. Beethoven is the greatest of those who have supplied to this broader combinative form—this larger assemblage of parts-matter adequate for its utterance. This he does mainly through his power of creating subject. It is because there is in the Beethoven subject, on the one hand, the deep note of human feeling-the echo of the heart-and, on the other hand, that note of something elevated-mysterious-vague-which seems the echo of outspreading nature upon the solitary mind, that it has power to so invest this large form of composition-which can only speak in wordless melody or the still stranger accents of wordless rhythm-as to produce an impression powerful and serious in the highest

In Beethoven the great school of symphony attains its zenith. In musical art, as we shall again have occasion to point out, progress, after a certain development is attained, cannot be carried on except through change of style. In the short instrumental movement which opens M. Gounod's "Redemption," there is the sign of a change of style; though whether development will go further in this direction is quite uncertain. The style suggested-for it is not a matured style-to distinguish it from the dialectic style of the symphonists, may be described as a style of graphic presentation. Thematic treatment is absent, but there is new harmonic effect. It would appear that the composer does not express himself gradually by the succession and changing relations of themes having intrinsic beauty, but more immediately, by general effect. It is as if sound were re-presented in primal vagueness, and massiveness,

Recently the music of Richard Wagner has much exercised the musical mind. In this music there is no important addition to those principles of construction which we have reviewed. The capital point in Wagner is a new application of music to the dramatic occasion. Whereas, in the case of conventional opera, the poetic environment of the dramatic incident is scanty in the extreme, in the case of Wagnerian drama it is rich to exuberance; and whilst, in the of representative themes. He bends the two modes case of conventional opera, the music at certain points of the subject broadens into developed forms of composition, in the Wagnerian drama it does not, but only serves to keep pace with that profuse poetic outflow, which is never arrested for the sake of musical development, and of which the attending music-speaking principally through the orchestra-is restricted to reflect the surface expression. The result is, on the musical side, a flow of nervous, changing effect, not differing from other music in its smaller divisions, but, in its wholeness, differing from ordinary operatic music in having no broad unity-in Wagnerian drama, as in the case of the ancient Greek tragedies and epic poems, the broad unity being given by the poetry.

We are not concerned to endeavour to strike the accurate balance of advantage between these two methods. It is obvious that certain advantages attend each. That the presence of formal constructions in an opera is highly effective at certain culminating points, where there may be a pause in the development of the plot-a pause, perhaps, necessary for the full realisation of the situation-cannot be gainsaid. On the other hand, in the case of dialogue, the Wagnerian method gives immensely increased scope for poetic fulness and dramatic force. One instance of this is the protracted dialogue-exuberant in natural suggesting, fraught with primal force and freshness-between Siegmund and Sieglinde, in the

In the one method, music is the formative element in the general effect; in the other, poetry. The question here suggests itself, whether it is necessary to pursue one method throughout a work, to the total exclusion of the other? In discussion of this subject much is apt to be said as to which method is the more natural. But the test of nature is not always to the point. Where a reflection of nature is suggested, and no art-effect is gained by that reflection not being absolutely true, the test of nature is to the point; but where special effect is gained by departure from the natural, it is not. By natural we now mean the every-day aspect of the world of nature and man. The natural may, in certain circumstances, be more appropriate and powerful for art impressure than anything else. But dominant and fundamental as the natural may be in art, it is still, in art, only a factor. Art is a new world in which, as we have stated elsewhere, the sternest realities, as well as the softest visions of the world of daily life, are but materials of a recreation by man for the gratification of his fuller sympathies—the expression of his fuller nature.

The well-known peculiarity of Wagner's musical method, of using representative themes, does not appear to us a remarkable discovery, whoever may have made it. The deliberate and laborious musical ticketing of all the important characters and objects in a drama reminds us (as does the introduction of a question, obviously for the sake of the interrogatory form, in the text of certain double choruses of J. S. Bach) of that combined naïveness and platitude to which Matthew Arnold alludes as inextricably mingled with the great elements in the German mind. The themes themselves with their entourage—that is to say, the special application of this method—makes all the difference. As employed by Wagner, we feel bound to say that this practice is shown to be consistent with effect strong and dignified. Further, one result of it is to remind the listener-if a reminder should be necessary-of that ever close coincidence between change of idea in the text and of expression in the music, which is the leading principle of Wagner's art.

As regards musical procedure, Wagner departs from the principles of his foregoers in one respect, of construction-fugal effect and counter-melodic effect-to his reigning dramatic purpose. Fugal effect is, as we have seen, a form of developmentthe perfection of this style being an even, well rounded general effect composed of clear themes. Counter-melodic effect is a riper form of development, the principle of which is mutual enhancement of the constituent themes. Now Wagner uses both these modes of construction, for neither the sake of wellrounded general effect nor for mutual enhancement of themes, but for a purely dramatic purpose.

The following is an effect of imitation, typifying the emotional union of Siegmund and Sieglinde. It forms portion of the treatment of the dialogue to which we have referred-

The following may be regarded as an example of thematic combination, prompted not by a melodic impulse, and aiming at the enhancement of both themes, but prompted by a dramatic purpose, the themes being arbitrarily associated—

Wagner thus initiates a principle of thematic combination which differs both from that governing the fugue writers and from that animating the symphonists. In the case of both these, the development is, as we have shown, governed by a purely musical feeling; but in Wagner it is dominated by an outer dramatic exigency.

Wagner's pure literary work as a librettist is as important, if it does not outshine, his work as a composer. He has raised the literary basis of opera to the high poetic level. His "Nibelungen Ring" teems with powerful examples of both epic and romantic poetry. Whilst fraught largely with myth and fantasy, it is still, through the very genuineness and power of its poetic inspiration, redolent of nature. imaginativeness being that of the true poet, the whole creation throbs strongly with life. Thus, in the case of the characters, notwithstanding they are ultra-human, they are felt as strongly human. Unlike most conceptions of the supernatural, their largeness gives fuller life. Notwithstanding Brunnhilde rides through the clouds, the very poetic force of her conception endues her with the "clay that burns," the "colour that changes."

Let us now review briefly the progress of that impulse which, aiming first at compound melody, led to the fugue; afterwards to the great vocal constructions based upon the fugue; and which, as one of the elements of thematic treatment, is connected with the principle of development which prevails in the great instrumental works of the modern period.

The first impulse is melodic-the impulse toward compound melodic effect. This leads in time to the production of the inchoate harmonic mass. Melodic effect, which in compound form was the original aim. becomes now lost. Rhythm is, however, developed. and this departure is a consequence of the strict use | Subsequently clear harmonic form becomes differentiated, and chords are applied to melody. The Lutheran chant exhibits this advance, the polyphonal impulse, of which the principle is even melodic value of the parts, being in this direction exhausted. Subsequently the importance of the chord of the dominant seventh in the harmonic enchainment of the scale is recognised.

The results of this general development so far, are to add depth and colour to the melodic design by means of harmony; and to extend its scope, and increase its perspicuity principally by means of the chord of the dominant seventh. In the field of fugal elaboration the themes are now clearer, whilst the definite harmonic progression which their enweavement involves, supplies to the mind a sense of fundamental order.

The next important step is the art of accompaniment. Out of the cultivation of this art arose the great principle of construction—"counter-melodic effect"—i.e., true melody subordinate to a leading theme, and involving clear harmonic progression. This is still a living principle of construction, and operates largely in the works of Wagner and Gounod. In this effect we have the old polyphonal impulse living again, but in a clearer atmosphere, being shaped by a keener melodic sense, and in what we may term the light of harmonic law.

The first lesson to be learned from this review is the importance of subject, theme, or melodic outline. The desire to consummate compound melodic outline led to the accumulation of experiences, amidst which harmonic effect was discovered. Subsequently the influence of harmony was felt mainly in three ways: First, in deepening the effect of melody; secondly, in rendering its design clear; and, thirdly, in extending the scope of this design. The leading part played by theme in musical development, is betrayed by the fact that if we glance broadly along this path up to Beethoven the following three phases in the relation of theme and its treatment are observable. First, the phase where the treatment obscures the theme: this phase occurs in the early fugal period; secondly, the phase where the enweavement of the themes, though complex, is felt to involve an underlying order: this occurs in the period of clear tonality following upon the discovery of the chord of the dominant seventh; thirdly, the phase where the treatment not merely renders the subject clear-not merely imbues it with colour and gives to it depth—but calls out of it a stream of new effect. This is connected with the discovery of "thematic treatment," with the modern development of instrumental music, and occurs in the period ushered in by Haydn, and marked by the figure of Beethoven.

Thus melody is, in the end, exalted by that which it unfolded; it may be said to have led to its own convironment and higher display; or we may state the same truth in another way by saying, that melody is the first sign of that musical feeling of which combinative form is the fuller expression.

As showing the leading part played by theme in musical sensation, we may here repeat a fact already referred to—viz., that the enjoyment of regular harmony is peculiarly intense when the outline involved by some one part is kept before the attention; it is as it affects outline, that the power of regular harmony is most keenly felt. It has also been pointed out by Mr. Gurney, that whatever may be the effect of certain harmonic changes in themselves, they acquire inordinately increased expression when applied at certain points of a melody. The fact that some music, are the result not of new combinations but of new applications of old ones, also testifies to this general truth—viz., that the power of harmony depends largely upon its organic connection with melody, that it is realised as a quality of melodic form. The progressions of the chord of the tonic to the chord of the subdominant, and vice versa, are old progressions, but these progressions with the chords in the following positions produce effects which are modern in character—

Again, the first of these progressions occurs between the second and third bars of the following example; the effect is not only modern, but has a peculiar freshness—

The leading part played by subject is further pointed to by the fact that the two composers who, in different styles and at different periods, unfolded the greatest poetic power in works of highly combinative form—viz., Handel and Beethoven, are both remarkable for their subjects.

Thus when we view the general progress of musical development we see how large is the part in this progress which is played by theme. We also see that throughout particular compositions, as well as in particular effects, theme does not always occupy the leading position, but that sometimes rhythmic design and sometimes harmonic effect occupies this position.

In Handel's "Hailstone" chorus the likeness of human enunciation involving antiphonal effect, is the principal element. At a culminating point in Mendelssohn's chorus "Thanks be to God," the leading element is harmonic change, notwithstanding there

We have seen further, that the element of harmonic change, besides appearing in such circumstances as the above—i.e., in connection with melodic or rhythmic effect—may alone involve a certain subtle form, and of itself unfold expression. We have already alluded to an example of this in the music to the words "He was bruised for our iniquities," in "The Messiah." The peroration of Haydn's chorus "The Heavens are telling the glory of God," is also made up virtually of harmonic change. Yet even in these cases an inflected outline is observable, although it does not rise to importance. But M. Gounod in "The Redemption" has eliminated entirely the thematic element and relied for expression upon pure harmonic change in the form of accompaniment to a reiterated note—harmonic effects generally felt as peculiar to modern occurs to the word "above."

These examples and all they involve do not weaken the lesson of the leading nature of theme, which we draw from the general progress of music; but they re-impress the truth that, in practice and experiment aided by the originating power of genius, new regions of effect are entered—new powers of expression acquired.

Another fact here suggests itself. Notwithstanding the continuous and varied growth of musical effect, the great wave of emotion produced by music is not increased proportionately. In a foregoing page we alluded to the fact that when the fundamental elements of effect are once arrived at, nothing but idea is really essential for the attainment by art of its highest reach. A likeness of this property of the art-emotion, of attaining a defined zenith of force beyond which it cannot rise—is to be found in the influence of external nature upon the poetic idiosyncrasy. The simplest natural effect may prove sometimes virtually as potent to stir emotion as the most elaborate. A spray of the hedge-row, a gleam of the splendour of light, may lift the wave of poetic rapture to its bounds. Larger display may arouse a more massive sensation, but need not necessarily raise feeling to a higher level. In the simplest natural beauty there is evidenced the majesty of phenomena—the sign of the Inscrutable. Such an effect serves to define quite clearly the gulf between our powers and a power without—to imbue the sense of that infinity which is around and beyond us-and to drive multitudinous feelings into one wave of awe and homage. It is difficult not to imagine that this feeling entered into the primal religious emotion. If, however, religion had not its source in this sentiment, was not bodied forth by it, this feeling has nevertheless breathed into religion much that is elevated in its spirit. It is a feeling akin to this that is imbued by great art; and it may be, because great art has so frequently the note of this feeling, that throughout the steep and irregular ascent of its progress, its emotional influence is so uniform as to force and elevation.

In the case of musical art, we cannot say that its slighter effects are virtually as potent to raise this large feeling as grander displays. The smaller creations in music, however beautiful they may be, we accept as simple products of human volition; but in the case of the larger inspirations, an outer power seems to be brought to bear upon us, and we seem here also to meet with the majesty of phenomena—to have the sense of a beauty and a power mysterious, solemn, and infinite. These remarks may contain some explanation of the fact that, in contemplating the influence of the great spirits of musical art, we cannot say that the last stirs the nature more

We may form an image of this high unity in the spirit of musical art if we compare the great composers to successive workers upon a Cathedral, the rearing of which extends over generations. The handiwork of the early workers differs from that of still later labourers. Yet, though the achievement of each era varies according to the special taste which circumstances in each case set, and according to the spirit of each respective time, still the work of each period contains the high spirit of the whole conception; for the whole work—inspired more or less with a common enthusiasm—possesses a unity of aim. Thus it is that as the main conformation of this cumulative and varied creation appears, the emotion it calls forth is virtually as high and powerful as when the latest detail is added.

This image illustrates another truth of musical art—the work of a particular time being done, is done. The next important area of work must not only be fresh work, but contain effect in fresh style; it cannot be simply a repetition of a foregoing kind of vork.

It would seem, at first sight, that in one respect this image is not applicable to the enduring edifice of musical development. A Cathedral, it may be said, suggests finality, whilst art is not only long but tending ever onward. But a vast architectural conception, embodying living enthusiasm and a high ideal, although, being a human structure, it may suggest finality, yet, as it is further a work which aims at spiritual suggestiveness, it not inappropriately, even in its material design, admits of continual development-of unlimited enrichment. At any time may here be built a chapel, here be added a tower, here decoration. Our image still holds good. We are not prepared to speak of art generally, but of musical art we may say that, whilst it at times suggests finality, it tends ever onward. Whilst, as each development is matured, there is a tendency to regard the limit of growth as virtually reached, we should bear in mind that it is the very nature of genius to present the unexpected. So long as musical art is the expression of true poetic fire and the aspiration to a high ideal, it will not cease to grow-to unfold undreamt of beauty.

CAROLAN, THE LAST OF THE BARDS.

THE four qualifications of a bard in ancient Erin were "Purity of hand, bright without wounding-Purity of mouth, without poisonous satire-Purity of learning, without reproach—Purity, as a husband in wedlock." He had to pass through seven years of study, committing to memory an incredible number of earlier compositions, and giving the closest attention to the laws of verse, before he was allowed to become a poet upon his own account. No doubt in early times the character and position of the bard was a noble one; and although an important section of the bards, as the poetry of the Irish Ossian goes to prove, supported the Druids in their opposition to St. Patrick, some of their leaders were the first to embrace Christianity, and two of them were members of a council convened by the Saint to remodel the Irish Pagan Code of Law upon purer principles. Still, it would appear that just in the same way as Greek and Latin lost their literary force with the spread of Christianity and fell into the hands of scholars rather than poets, so the Irish language lost caste as a medium for literary expression, in the consideration of the schoolmen, and was relegated to those of the bards who still struggled against the new faith.

As time wore on, the bards yielded to the scholar and historian the epic poetry of their country, contenting themselves more and more with such lyrical compositions as odes and elegies, in honour of the native chieftains still struggling against the English supremacy, which they, in many instances, both composed and played. The poet, Edmund Spenser, in his "View on the state of Ireland," makes Eudoxus say to Irenæus, "But tell me, I pray you, have they (the bards) any art in their compositions, or be they anything witty or well-savoured, as poems should be?" To which Irenæus replies, "Yea, truly, I have caused divers of them to be translated unto me, that I might understand them, and surely they savoured of sweet wit and good invention, but skilled not of the goodly ornaments of poetry; yet were they sprinkled with some pretty flowers of their natural device, which gave good grace and comeliness unto them." During the Penal Era severe restrictions and penalties were imposed upon the bards, who were gradually descending in the social scale, although they still maintained an honourable position.

About this time the bard had merged into the minstrel or harper, and during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Irish nobility and gentry supported their native music and song so liberally that many of them employed harpers of their own. These minstrels were, however, not mere musicians; some of them, notably the subject of this sketch, composed the words and music of their songs, and then sang them to the accompaniment of their harps.

Carolan was certainly the most remarkable of the Irish minstrels. Born in the year 1670, he early lost his sight through small-pox, but solaced himself for this deprivation by the study of music, in which he made astonishing progress. The Irish Monthly Review gives this instance of his wonderful musical memory, and his extraordinary power of musical improvisation:—" At the house of an Irish nobleman, where Geminiani was present, Carolan challenged that eminent composer to a trial of skill. The musician played over on his violin the Fifth Concerto of Vivaldi; it was instantly repeated by Carolan on his heard it before. his harp, although he had never ore. The surprise of the company was increased when Carolan asserted that he would compose a Concerto himself, and did then and there invent a piece that has since gone by his name. He composed upon the buttons of his coat, the buttons serving for the purpose of the lines, the intervals between them for the spaces." Another story about Carolan is adduced in amusing proof of his amazing musical memory. He was about to perform one evening at a patron's house in competition with another minstrel whom he had overheard a little previously practising what was evidently intended to be his show piece on the occasion. When the trial came off, Carolan, as the more distinguished harper, was called upon to play first, and, to the mingled rage and astonishment of his rival, played, as his own, the very piece which he was about to perform, but with a feeling and finish he could never have approached. Carolan had received his education and professional outfit in the family of MacDermot Roe, of Alderford House, in the county of Roscommon, and here he was always wel-

But Carolan was a sad vagabond, with a restless love of excitement and an unfortunate turn for dissipation, at that time too common amongst the Irish harpers. His taste for drink, which in the end completely mastered him, was probably encouraged by his close intimacy with MacDermot's butler, an intimacy which, as will be afterwards seen, he kept up to the very hour of his death. Carolan was no mean poet, although his verse is occasionally tainted by coarseness. The following is a favourable speciby Sir Samuel Ferguson :-

Whoever the youth, who by heaven's degree,
Has his happy right hand 'neath that bright head of thine
'Tis certain that he
From all sorrow is free
Till the day of his death, if a life so divine
Should not raise him in bliss above mortal degree
Mild Mabel-ni-Kelley, bright Coolun of curls,
All stately and pure as the swan on the lake
Her mouth of white teeth is a palace of pearls,
And the youth of the land are lovesick for her sake

No strain of the sweetest e'er heard in the land That she knows not to sing, in a voice so enchanting, That the cranes on the strand

That the cranes on the strand

O, for hal saleep where they stand,

To shed its mild radiance o'er bosom or hand!

The dewy, blue blossom that hangs on the spray,

More blue than her eye, human eye never saw,

Deceit never lurked in its beautiful ray,—

Dear lady, I drink to you, stainte go bragh!

All Carolan's songs, with one exception, were written in Irish, and are not therefore generally accessible. He did not, however, adhere entirely to the Irish style of composition, and his musical pieces show a considerable Italian and German influence: yet, as Mr. Bunting writes, "he felt the full excellence of the ancient music of his country." Carolan was deeply but hopelessly attached to a lady named Bridget Cruise, to whom he dedicated fifteen pieces, and some of my readers will probably recollect Lover's pathetic poem, occasioned by the blind old harper recognising his early love by the touch of her hand as he assisted her out of a ferry-boat. Carolan, although quite blind, as we have noticed, was possessed of extraordinary animal spirits and love of fun and frolic of every description. As a proof of his versatility it is only to be said that he was the author of the air of "The Last Rose of Summer" on the one hand, and of "Bumper Squire Jones" on the other. He was a most prolific composer; one harper at the beginning of this century was alone acquainted with about a hundred of his tunes, and many were at that time believed to have been lost.

Wherever he travelled he met with a warm welcome and poured forth odes and songs with an ease as astonishing as that possessed by Haydn himself, in acknowledgment of the hospitality with which he was greeted. Sometimes, but very rarely, Carolan received a sour reception; but he was always equal to the occasion. On being denied admittance to one well-stored cellar by the major-domo Dermod O'Flinn.

What a pity hell's gates are not kept by O'Flinn, So surly a dog would let nobody in.

The record of his death is a painfully grotesque one. "Immediately before his decease at Alderford House he called for a drink, which was quickly brought to him by the butler, William O'Flinn, his old friend," and having quenched his thirst, he addressed the following quatrain in a clear and distinct voice to his friendly attendant, after which he laid down his head and immediately sank into the slumber of death:-

I have travelled round right through Conn's country, And I found myriads in it strong and valiant But, by my baptism, I never found in any part One who quenched my thirst aright but William O'Flinn.

Carolan left behind him one son and six daughters. The former published in 1747 a collection of his father's music, which, however, is probably a very imperfect one from the causes above assigned.

Persons interested in the teaching of music in our elementary schools will find the reports contained in the Blue Book for the year ending August 31, 1885, decidedly encouraging. Dr. Stainer's verdict on the thirty-seven training colleges personally inspected by him is that "the music is in as good a state as can men of his powers, the original Celtic being to the be expected, considering the variable and unequal full as poetical as the subjoined spirited translation condition of the students at their entrance." This verdict is endorsed by Messrs. McNaught and Barrett, Dr. Stainer's assistants, who were responsible children, and the consequent thinness of their voices, for the sole inspection of the twelve remaining colleges. Of the colleges for male students, the highest percentage of marks was obtained by Homerton, the lowest by Carmarthen and Culham; while of those for female students, Lincoln stands at the head and Truro at the foot of the list of averages. The papers worked by "acting teachers" for Mr. McNaught yielded some answers worthy of a place in the immortal "Diversions of a Pedagogue." Thus a tempo is said to mean "furious Pedagogue." Thus a tempo is said to mean "furious with rage," and the causes of flat singing are variously described as "leaning against wood," "eating apples," and "cold feet." From the general divisional reports on the work done in the elementary schools, we gather that the relative percentage of schools where the grant is earned for singing by note and those where it is earned for singing by ear fluctuates considerably in the different The best results are obtained in the Metropolitan districts and Lancashire, the worst in Herefordshire, Oxfordshire, and Cambridgeshire. The following is a summary of statistics in connection with the music grant: -Out of a total of 3,293,212 children the shilling grant for singing by note is earned in the case of 1,282,586, the sixpenny grant for singing by ear in 1,997,572 cases, while for the remaining 13,054 no grant is given. But these figures are deceptive. For example, in the South-Western division singing by note was offered only in 284 schools, while in 2,738 the children sang by ear only; whereas in the North Central division singing by note was attempted in about one-third of the schools, more than ninety per cent. of which are taught on the Tonic Sol-fasystem, which is "all but invariably adopted" in the North-Eastern division as well. The same remarks also apply to the Eastern and Welsh divisions. At the same time, even in the most promising districts, such as Nottingham, attention is drawn by the inspectors to the inefficiency of the teaching. "No very great advance can be expected till the influence of the inspector of music is brought to bear directly on the teaching of it in the schools" (p. 301). And again in the Ipswich district the assistant inspector remarks: "I believe we shall never have really good singing in our schools till more attention is given to the musical education of our pupil-teachers." That such attention is being given, we have the best assurance in Dr. Stainer's report, and in his cheering acknowledgment of the great improvement noticeable in the work done at the Training Colleges since he first began his periodical visits some three years ago, an improvement which has hardly had time yet to re-act upon the schools. This acknowledgment was made during the discussion which followed an interesting paper on the Teaching of Music in Elementary Schools, recently read by Mr. Brown, the correspondent for the Marylebone district, at a meeting of the Musical Association. We may so far anticipate the publication of this paper as to record some of the points on which the speaker laid special stress. These were that it was essential to secure a higher level of attainment in the teachers themselves, especially in regard to voice production and breathing; that there was room for great improvement in the character of the music performed, which included at present a good deal of rubbish, and of garbled or incomplete versions of standard pieces; and finally that there was a wide field for the composition of good music for children, specially written with a view to the registers and compass of their voices. Numerous difficulties, he pointed out, hampered the advance of musical education, amongst which were the limited time at the disposal of the teacher, the poor physique of the but one representative for music and the drama. The their habit of shouting and yelling in the streets and elsewhere, and lastly, the limited knowledge or comparative ignorance of the inspector. The general tone of the paper and of the ensuing discussion was, however, eminently hopeful.

ALTHOUGH the Musical Pitch question is practically shelved so far as England is concerned, we are glad to have the opportunity of giving our readers the gist of some very telling comments upon the decision of the defunct Committee. Major Armstrong, a retired English officer, writes to us from Brussels to point out that so far from the French pitch having been recently adopted in Belgium it has been "for many years in force in all schools, conservatoires, theatres, &c., everywhere except in the army. The recent Royal decree merely ordered its adoption in the military bands also." Now in Belgium, as our correspondent points out, unlike England, the connection between civil and military music has always been close and general, and in view of the two pitches, which till the other day ran side by side, military players of woodwind instruments found it well worth their while to have two instruments, one for each pitch. "That which the Committee declare to be an insuperable difficulty in England, therefore, was found to be no difficulty whatever in the very country to which their attention was directed." Under the circumstances we hardly wonder that our correspondent should frankly taunt the Committee with the intention of burking the question all along. "That may well have been, for there are serious difficulties enough which they never alluded to. But it is a pity they could not have found a better excuse; they seized the first difficulty they encountered, regardless what a trivial and irrelevant excuse it formed. . . . It is not creditable to the official representatives of English music that they should have ignored, if they were not really ignorant of, the state of facts in England; and that it should have been left to any amateur who has ever crossed the Channel to set them right on an elementary question as to their own art in a country almost in sight of England." We expressed a desire in our last issue for some statistics or precise information as to the dependence of our orchestras upon military bandsmen, and our conviction as to the exaggerated statement of that dependence made by the recent Committee has been borne out by two exceedingly interesting letters contributed to the Era by Mr. Franz Groenings. As he puts it, "I am sure those few players who are fortunate enough to hold leading positions both in a regimental band and in an orchestra would not commence a memorial with 'We the wind instrument players of Great Britain.'" On the dependence of the character of the various keys upon alterations of pitch, and on the vexed question of "brilliancy," Mr. Groenings' remarks are so practical and clear that we greatly regret they were not published earlier and more widely circulated. In the whole course of the recent agitation we have encountered nothing more effective or humorous than his treatment of the subject. His suggestion as to the disposal of the old instruments is novel and entertaining, "Give them," he says, "to the Salvation Army and to the German bands." Meanwhile the International Conference, representing all the chief European countries except France and England, has been sitting at Vienna; but at the time of going to press no report of the decision arrived at had yet come to hand.

In the dark ages of musical oriticism, it was a by no means uncommon practice for editors to employ nated with comedy, witnessed, if we are not much mistaken, a revival of this economical custom, to judge from the inadequate notices which appeared in some of our dailies. But the reticence which marked such reports has lately been succeeded by a mixture of Bœotian ignorance and ingenious condescension truly beautiful to contemplate. In the preliminary notice of the works to be given at the recent Bristol Musical Festival, in a London daily paper of October 20, we read: "On Thursday morning we have an opera complete without the actors (i.e., in character) and the usual theatrical furniture. Berlioz's ' Faust' will be given as complete as circumstances permit off the stage." The writer returns to the charge after the performance and compliments the committee upon the success which attended their bold step "of producing an opera almost complete off the stage." Then, to instance his kindly enthusiasm and patronising appreciation, we may quote his remark that Mendelssohn's "old Loreley fragment" is "a composition of high merit," and that the "Elijah" is a "lovely work." To complete this list of musical misdemeanours, we should add that in an appreciative notice of the first of the Oratorio Concerts, another London daily asserted that the "Holy Supper of the Apostles," which is to be performed at the fifth Concert, is an excerpt from "Parsifal," and that Dvorák's "Patriotic Hymn," recently given at Mr. Geaussent's Concert, would be heard for the first time in England at the fourth of the series. Our leading papers owe it to themselves and their readers to avoid such blunders and ineptitudes as those we have cited above. When the services of their regular critics are not available or are dispensed with, editors should secure competent substitutes or confine themselves to plain statements of fact unadorned either by effusive praise or efforts of imagination.

It is a curious and instructive circumstance that while musicians on the other side of the channel regard, or profess to regard, our doings with indifference and contempt, no sooner does one of their number, capable of judging, honour our leading performances with his presence than he gives utterance to expressions of the utmost delight and surprise. It will be remembered, for example, how M. Lamoureux spoke with enthusiasm of our Handel Festival, and how zealously he laboured to awaken a love for Oratorio among his fellow-countrymen. Now we have succeeded in gaining a tribute from the distinguished composer, performer, and critic, M. Saint-Saëns, who, after hearing "Mors et Vita" in the Albert Hall, wrote the following letter to Le Ménestrel :-

"Mon cher Heugel,-J'ai eu la chance, samedi dernier, d'entendre à Londres 'Mors et Vita' et j'en ai éprouvé une si grande impression que je ne puis résister au plaisir de vous en faire part.

"C'est une œuvre magnifique, et c'est un très grand succès. On l'exécutait à Albert Hall pour la seconde fois, et, malgré le temps affreux et la difficulté de se rendre dans un quartier éloigné, l'immense salle était pleine d'un public attentif, que les sévérités de ce gigantesque 'Requiem' ne semblaient pas rebuter le moins du monde. Il est bien difficile de se rendre compte de cette œuvre d'après la partition de piano; l'habileté consommée de l'instrumentation, l'emploi judicieux de l'orgue, et surtout l'admirable façon de traiter les voix, sont pour beaucoup dans le charme de l'audition. Il faut encore à cette musique de large envergure un grand espace, de grandes

Si l'intérêt dramatique ne soutient pas 'Mors et Vita' comme 'Rédemption,' le souffle y est peut-être plus grand et l'inspiration plus haute, l'auteur y a fait un emploi plus fréquent du style fugué, cher à l'oratorio, et plus que jamais a enveloppé toute l'œuvre dans sa puissante personnalité.

On a renoncé à prononcer le latin à l'anglaise; on le prononce à l'italienne, ce qui devrait se faire partout, cette prononciation devant être nécessairement celle qui se rapproche le plus de la vérité.

"Pardonnez-moi de vous avoir ennuyé si longtemps et croyez à mes sentiments de sincère amitié. "C. SAINT-SAËNS. "Huddersfield, 17 Novembre, 1885."

In a book, recently published, called "The World of London," written by Count Vasili, we have a number of opinions concerning prominent persons and prominent institutions, which must certainly astonish the majority of residents in the Metropolis. With none of the subjects touched upon, however, are we here concerned, save with that of music, to which a short chapter is devoted. In this we have the following sentence, which is astounding enough to be quoted precisely as it stands: "London has no Conservatoire, though there are, it is true, a number of Schools of Music, the Royal College, the Royal Academy, the Guildhall School, and others; but these are all either private undertakings or societies; the lessons are very expensive, and the teaching leaves much to be desired. For example, the sol-fa and theory of music are not obligatory, and a scholar may receive honours and distinctions who cannot read a line of music at sight, or beat the time of a single bar." The next quotation not only gives another piece of exclusive information, but tells us what "Sol-fa" in England means: "The grammar of music is unknown in London, and no pupil would submit to being forced to learn it. The Sol-fa is here called harmony." Leaving our readers, who know the working of the schools named, to wonder, with us, from what source this statement could be derived. we must say that the publishers, after informing us that they had agreed to publish this work without having seen any portion of it, stipulating that they should be allowed to use their judgment and discretion in the suppression of any part of the book they might consider objectionable, frankly avow that they have found themselves compelled to omit several passages, "which they can only regard as scandalous, if not libellous." From the specimens we have given, it will be seen that some passages of this kind have been overlooked.

WE have had so frequently to take exception to the musical attitude of the Globe, that it gives us great pleasure to acknowledge the welcome extended by that journal to the new development of the winter season, as well as their appeal to the public to show itself sensible of the efforts being made on its behalf by the originators of the "Symphony" and "Oratorio" Concerts. But it is a strange thing that the "oldest evening newspaper" should complain of the masses chorales et instrumentales, il lui faut aussi dearth of variety which has hitherto marked the un public recueilli, suivant des yeux le texte et winter as opposed to the summer musical season.

To do so is to be oblivious of the claims of the Crystal Palace, the Albert Hall, the Sacred Harmonic, and the Popular Concerts, as well as a whole host of city and suburban institutions, whose increasing enterprise and proficiency is one of the most hopeful signs of English music. Were it not for the Richter summer series and the prospective summer season of the Carl Rosa Company, amateurs would run serious risk of "starvation" at the very time when our contemporary supposes them to be surfeited with musical pabulum.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

Nothing could have been more auspicious than the opening, on the 4th ult., of this Society's new season. begin with, there was the interest of a famous novelty: M. Gounod's Sacred Trilogy, composed for the recent Birmingham Festival, being produced for the first time in London. "Mors et Vita" naturally excited great interest among metropolitan amateurs, doing so as the work of a composer whose name is powerful by reason of successes worthily gained, and who, three years before, had contributed to sacred music an abiding attraction. was expected, therefore, that a crowd would flock to the first performance, making even the ample spaces of the Albert Hall too strait for their accommodation. This forelook was largely realised by the actual presence of an immense audience, comprising an unusual number of persons prominent, as amateurs or professionals, in the musical world. The performance tendered to this large and representative gathering was worthy of its subject and of the occasion. In some respects it transcended that given at Birmingham. The orchestral movements, it is true, were not so impressively rendered as in the Midland town, for the simple reason that the force employed fell short of the requirements of so large an area. This had a corresponding effect in the accompaniments, which might have been more sonorous with advantage to some of the movements. On other points there was everything to praise. The choruses, for example, were given almost to perfection, and spake volumes for the energy and skill that alone could have produced so fine a result. We hasten to congratulate Mr. Barnby upon a fact so creditable to himself and his choir. Taking place under conditions thus favourable, the performance presented the work before the audience in a manner generally adequate to the formation of an opinion upon its merits. What that opinion was can, of course, be gathered only from outward indications, given by those who have not yet submitted to the social rule which discourages expression of feeling. Thus far, and also as regards the close attention of the great gathering, evidence is in favour of sympathy and approval. Some of the numbers were warmly applauded, while — most eloquent testimony of all—the exodus which usually sets in so early at Kensington Gore did not commence till long after the customary time. Coming to particulars, it should be noted that the Prologue and the opening numbers of the "Requiem" were received somewhat coldly, but soon the beautiful and characteristic music beginning with "Quid sum miser," produced its legitimate effect. From that point the audience were in touch of the composer, sympathy with whom reached a climax in the fine number entitled "Judex." Here a demand was made for repetition, wisely resisted by the Conductor, who knew better than to break the continuity of the work in deference to an impulsive demand. At the close of the performance there were renewed demonstrations, indicating still further the favourable bent of public opinion. M. Gounod's new work may now be considered as out on the stream of popular favour.

The soloists were, with one exception, those who took part in the Birmingham performance. Madame Albani again showed the beauty of voice, technical skill, and fervid expression which make her so acceptable in sacred works. We cannot agree on every point with her reading of the music, but, apart from matters of opinion as to which differences are easy, her whole effort was admirable.

Mr. Lloyd was once more faultless, and Mr. Santley, though a little out of voice, as finished in style and correct in expression as ever.

"Mors et Vita" drew a still larger audience on Saturday afternoon, the 14th ult., when it was performed under precisely the same conditions and with equal success.

NOVELLO'S ORATORIO CONCERTS.

THE inauguration of these Concerts, at St. James's Hall, on the 10th ult., was in every respect a marked success. No more appropriate work could have been selected than the sacred masterpiece of the appointed Conductor of the series of Concerts, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, for although "The Rose of Sharon" has now thoroughly taken the high place in public estimation to which its exceptional merits entitle it, the knowledge of the composer's having formed a choir and trained it himself to a thorough comprehension of his work, encouraged a hope that it would receive a more perfect rendering than had yet been heard. This hope, we may say, was completely realised; for not only were the vocalists assembled under Mr. Mackenzie's bâton of excellent quality and the balance of tone highly satisfactory, but a dramatic feeling characterised the delivery of the choruses which evidenced not only the skill of the Conductor, but the earnestness and good will of the members of the choir. Of course no criticism upon the composition is called for on the present occasion; but we must say that increased familiarity with the music raised our estimate, not only of its abstract beauty, but of its which, considering its varied character, demands the warmest praise. The admirable manner in which the solos were given by Madame Albani, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Tufnail need scarcely be recorded; but mention must be made of the refinement with which these solos were accompanied by the band, under the experienced leadership of Mr. Carrodus, and also of the delicacy and beauty of tone with which the orchestral movements "Spring morning on Lebanon" and "Sleep" were played. Not only were what may be termed the popular portions of the work eagerly seized upon by the audience as points where audible demonstrations of approval might with propriety be indulged in, but in the more subtle parts the close attention, and even subdued murmurs of approval, of the hearers showed that they fully entered into the spirit of the composer's meaning; and the ovation accorded to Mr. Mackenzie, both at the end of the first part and at the conclusion of the performance, was evidently as spontaneous as it was well deserved. Considering the importance of the compositions to be given during this series of Concerts, it is gratifying to find that a choir has been organised so thoroughly competent to grapple with the many difficulties to be encountered, and to place the works before an audience with due regard for their high artistic claims. In closing our notice, therefore, of the first "Oratorio Concert," we couple our congratulations upon so excellent a performance with the brightest anticipations for the future.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THIS Society commenced its season on the 20th ult., under circumstances of more than ordinary interest. appointment of Mr. W. H. Cummings as Conductor had given general satisfaction, and it is worthy of note that all our leading choral associations in London are now under the direction of English musicians. Mr. Cummings had already given proof of his proficiency as a choirtrainer, but to direct an orchestra needs experience which time alone can furnish, and for the present it will be right to judge with leniency any shortcomings in this department. For this reason we shall not dwell upon some palpable errors which occurred on Friday week among the instrumentalists, marring the effect of a performance which, so far as the choir was concerned, left absolutely nothing to desire. The only fault that could be found with the programme was its excessive length. Three works were given, of which any two were sufficient Miss Hilda Wilson took the part originally assigned to for any ordinary Concert. That Sterndale Bennett's Can-Madame Patey, and did so in a highly creditable manner. | tata, "The Woman of Samaria," should never have been performed before by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is surprising only to those who are unacquainted with the circumstances which led to its exclusion for eighteen years. It was in the highest degree creditable to Mr. Cummings and the directors to mark the inauguration of a new regime by bringing forward the representative sacred work of a distinguished English composer, and though the Cantata may be more fitted for the church than the concert-room, such beautiful numbers as the airs, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," and "His salvation is nigh"; the chorus, "Therefore with joy"; and the quartet, "God is a spirit," must always create a vast impression, as they did on this occasion. It was scarcely just to M. Saint-Saëns's Nineteenth Psalm, "The heavens declare," to place it immediately after a work sufficient in itself for the first part of a Concert, and it says much for its merits that some of the numbers were received with hearty applause. The one defect in the Psalm is a certain inconsistency of style. The composer seems to have started with the idea of adopting the style of the Bach-Handel period, an especially difficult task for a French composer. Accordingly the early portion of the work is the least satisfactory, though technically clever enough. In No. 4, a chorus based on a tonic pedal, and descriptive of the splendour of the sun as he waxes and wanes, we get the first trace of individuality, and afterwards the music rapidly improves. No. 7, a quintet and chorus, "More to be desired"; No. 8, a sestet, "His errors who distinguisheth"; and No. 9, a mezzo-soprano air, "Thou, O Lord," are really beautiful, and the last-named is a gem. Some of the orchestration is very novel in conception, and taken altogether the Psalm is the work of a highly gifted musician, and well worthy the attention of choral societies. Of Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," which followed, it is only necessary to remark that while the old English version by Bartholomew, in which the words of the Saviour are placed in the mouth of St. John, was printed in the book of words, the performers sang the more literal translation of Mr. Troutbeck, misunderstanding, which tended to confuse the audience. might surely have been avoided. The principal vocalists of the evening were Miss Annie Marriott, Samuell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Bridson, and, with one exception, they were all satisfactory. Mr. McKay has a pleasing light tenor voice, and whatever may have been his shortcomings on this occasion, he has the making of a useful artist. Sudden indisposition was the cause of the mistakes which drew forth unfavourable comment in some notices of the Concert.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

When it is borne in mind that the score had only arrived in England four days before the Concert, the performance of Dvorák's Second Symphony, to which Mr. Manns treated his patrons on Saturday, October 31, must be considered a real triumph, in view of the remarkable difficulties which that extraordinary work presents to Conductor and instrumentalists. Nothing could have exceeded the spirit infused into the playing of the work by the Conductor, and it is to be hoped, in consideration of the great exertions necessary to secure such a rendering, as well as in the interests of connoisseurs, that room may be found for another performance during the season.

A young but gifted pianist, Signorina Gemma Luziani, was heard, for the first time, in Mendelssohn's familiar Pianoforte Concerto (No. 1), a work to which her feathery touch and graceful style are excellently adapted. The last movement was taken au grand galop, but with perfect technical finish and delicacy. If Signorina Luziani failed to create quite so favourable an impression later on in some selections from Chopin, this fact must in great part be ascribed to the unpleasant tone of the instrument employed on this occasion. The vocalist was Mr. Winch, who sang the barcarole, "Najadi e ninfe," from Goundo's "Polyeucte," and a rather uninteresting ballad by Ernest Ford, besides giving a finished rendering of the Italian Serenade in Sir Arthur Sullivan's incidental music to "The Merchant of Venice." Mr. Winch, by virtue of his refinement and enthusiasm, is a welcome addition to the ranks of our concert singers, and as a singer of German songs he is already in the van of living artists. Even apart from scenic accessories, Sir Arthur Sullivan's setting of the Masque had the effect which bright, tuneful, and well-made music is still capable of exerting. Weber's "Oberon" lost none of its enchantment in the hands of the Crystal Palace Orchestra, while the second movement of Mozart's "Little Serenade" served to show the purity and richness of the string contingent. The catholic taste of the Conductor was well exemplified in the programme of the fourth Concert, which included works by Bach, Schubert, Bennett, Wagner, Massenet, and Praeger, the last-named writer being responsible for the "Symphonic Poem" heard for the first time on this occasion. This work, entitled "Leben und Liebe, Kampf und Sieg," is symphonic in so far that it contains the prescribed number of movements. We are inclined to demur, however, to its claim to be called a poem, on the ground that poetry involves some continuity, a quality to which the disjecta membra of Mr. Praeger's work can hardly aspire. Madame Valleria brought all the re-sources of her finished method and dramatic feeling to the rendering of "Isolde's Verklärung." But admirable as was her delivery of this trying number, we have no hesitation in declaring our preference for its purely orchestral setting, now rendered so familiar by Herr Richter's repeated performances. Anywhere but in the Bayreuth theatre, the sense of conflict between singer and orchestra must detract from the pleasure of the auditor. Madame Valleria also contributed in excellent style a Recitative and Air, "'Tis in vain that I seek," from Massenet's "Mary Magdalen." In this work the composer abandons that lighter vein, in which he often displays such exquisite grace, for a more ambitious style. Bennett's charming Wood-Nymph Overture, notable for the high encomium passed on it by Schumann, opened the programme, which included Bach's Concerto for two flutes, violin, and strings-a work calculated to inspire respect rather than awaken enthusiasm-in which the solo parts were most efficiently sustained by Messrs. Wells, Tootill, and Carl Jung; and a superb performance of Schubert's great Symphony in C brought the Concert to a triumphant close.

The absence of novelty, and the attractions simultaneously offered on the same afternoon, in London, probably accounted for the sparse attendance at the fifth Concert of the series. Haydn's cheerful "Clock" Symphony, and Beethoven's E flat Concerto (No. 5), were the important events of the programme, and as we listened to the Palace orchestra, and Mr. Max Pauer's manly rendering of the solo in the latter work, an agreeable sensation of novelty and surprise was wrought upon us in spite of the very brief interval which had elapsed since we had heard the Concerto performed in London. Mr. Pauer's playing, which has greatly improved since his last appearance at the Palace, is characterised by breadth and intelligence. but is slightly deficient in sympathy and sentiment. His rendering of Grieg's fantastic "Norwegischer Brautzug," though spirited and correct, seemed hardly to do full justice to the humour of the situation; and Nicodé's showy Tarantella, better adapted for the drawing-room than the concert hall, sounded rather thin after the rich quality of tone displayed by the orchestra in Mackenzie's Ballade "La belle dame sans merci," which has probably never been more finely given. Mdlle. Antoinette Trebelli made a first appearance at these Concerts, and created, on the whole, a favourable impression. Her voice, though not great in volume, is well produced, and of a resonant and penetrating timbre. These qualities were exhibited in a by no means faultless rendering of " Deh vieni non tardar. A selection from Rubinstein's Suite "Bal Costumé." originally composed as a pianoforte duet, and brilliantly, if somewhat noisily orchestrated, concluded the programme in lively fashion.

The Crystal Palace choir made its rentrée on the 21st ult, on which occasion a long and varied programme was performed. The only novelty presented was the suite of ballet airs from Saint-Saëns's "Etienne Marcel," which, placed at the end of the programme, after the Choral Fantasia—in itself an adequate climax—hardly obtained a fair chance of winning the recognition due to its vivacity and clever orchestration. The "Pavane" is a particularly taking number, and the entrée des Bohémiens quite in the of Berlioz. Of the rendering of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, it will be enough to say that it was in every way worthy of Mr. Manns and his forces, and that the horns especially distinguished themselves in the third movement. Raff's C minor Pianoforte Concerto served to exhibit Mr. Oscar Beringer's excellent technique and pleasing touch. The same gentleman also sustained the solo part in an excellent performance of the Choral Fantasia. Besides lending efficient service in the last-named work, the choir contributed the choruses "Love and Hymen," from Handel's "Hercules," and "Haste thee, nymph," from the same composer's "L'Allegro," the air for tenor in the latter piece being rendered with a full appreciation for its somewhat ponderous humour by Mr. Charles Chilley. Berlioz's beautiful Nocturne duet, from his "Béatrice et Bénédict," sung by Miss Annie and Miss Edith Marriott, was honoured by a recall, which was due quite as much to the admirable delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment as to the efforts of the singers. We may be allowed to express our regret that it should have been found necessary to sing this piece in an English version of the French adaptation of Shakespeare's words. This double dilution, to all acquainted with the original, could not fail to be a source of exquisite irritation. Watkin Mills was set down to sing Schubert's "Wanderer," but was debarred at the eleventh hour by illness from appearing, and was efficiently replaced in the Choral Fantasia by a gentleman whose name did not transpire.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS

No changes of fashion nor outward circumstances of any kind seem to affect the stability of these entertainments, and in fact, notwithstanding the plethora of Concerts this autumn, Mr. Chappell's audiences have so far been above the average for the commencement of the season. This is encouraging to those who believe in a steady, though possibly not a rapid, advance in public taste. Unquestionably the most attractive feature at the first performance this season, on the 9th ult., was the rentrée of M. Vladimir de Pachmann, after an absence of nearly two years. We have referred elsewhere to the extraordinary popularity of the Russian pianist, and the special qualities as an executant which have contributed to give him the position he now holds among us. Here it need only be said that in a showy, though somewhat weak, Giga con Variazioni, by he exhibited the most exquisite finish, and was compelled to accept an encore, when he gave Chopin's Etude in C sharp minor (Op. 10, No. 4). The Giga was extracted from a Suite in E minor of Raff (Op. 91), and we may take this opportunity of saying that, as a matter of principle, the pianist ought to have played the whole work. It is not necessary to present the Monday Popular audiences with musical fragments. Madame Norman-Néruda displayed her refined virtuosity in a Legend and a Mazurka of Wieniawski, which the listeners applauded less on account of their intrinsic merit than by reason of the skill of the performer. Two favourite Quartets were given-namely, Beethoven's in F (Op. 59, No. 1) and Haydn's in D minor (Op. 42)—the executants being Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr L. Ries, Herr Hollander, and Herr Franz Néruda. The locum tenens for Signor Piatti is a thoroughly able executant, though his tone will not compare with that of the unrivalled Italian violoncellist. Mr. Lloyd was recalled after Wagner's "Preislied" and Schubert's "Thou whom I vowed to love."

The first Saturday Concert, on the 14th ult., drew a dense crowd of music lovers, notwithstanding the deplorable weather and the counter attraction of "Mors et Vita" at the Albert Hall. The programme commenced with Spohr's Quartet in D minor (Op. 74, No. 3), which was practically a novelty as it had only been heard once before, and that was twenty-two years ago. Making allowance for the undue prominence of the first violin, it is a masterly work. Many more of Spohr's Quartets have not been heard at all, and they might be drawn upon from time to time with advantage. M. de Pachmann introduced Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor (Op. 4), an early work.

rightly said, the name of the composer is writ large. The audience, however, was better pleased with Henselt's "Si oiseau j'étais," and encored the performer, who then gave one of Chopin's waltzes. Herr Straus, who was the leader on this occasion, played Max Bruch's characteristic Romance in A minor (Op. 42) with much effect, and a fine performance of Beethoven's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1) concluded the Concert. Mr. Maas was the vocalist. English music and musicians have enjoyed many triumphs of late, and another occurred on the 16th ult., when Miss Fanny Davies made her first appearance at these Concerts. The success she had gained at the Crystal Palace aroused high expectations, which happily were more than fulfilled. The young pianist has certainly had the best possible teachers in Mr. Charles Hallé, Herr Reinecke, and Madame Schumann, and the influence of the last-named great artist is strongly perceptible in her playing. There was very much to commend in her rendering of Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, though it was by no means a sensational performance. The passage writing and the fugue subject were brought out with beautiful clearness, and the original text was adhered to with praiseworthy devotion, considering that the work is now usually played in a modernised form. As an encore Miss Davies gave No. 7 of Mendelssohn's Characteristic Pieces with charming technique. She was enthusiastically received and her future seems secure. The concerted works at this Concert were Beethoven's Quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4), Schumann's in E flat (Op. 47), and Mozart's Duet in G for violin and viola, played by Madame Néruda and Herr Straus. An admirable new analysis was supplied of Schumann's work, and it seems likely that the public will benefit greatly by the engagement of Mr. Joseph Bennett as the editor of the books. They are being revised and brought up to date with great care and zeal. Mr. Lloyd sang "Adelaide" with perfect expression, and a new song, "For ever nearer," by G. F. Hatton, being a graceful and musicianly setting of some stanzas by D. G. Rossetti. The first important novelty of the season was included in the programme of the following Saturday. This was Grieg's Pianoforte Sonata in E minor (Op. 7), which it is curious no pianist ever thought of introducing before, as it is a charming, though unpretentious work, full of Scandinavian colour judiciously applied. The first three move-ments are very concise, and in fact, the winning themes are announced only to be abandoned. The Finale is more elaborate, though the thematic development is not remarkable. If the composer has been unduly modest, he has at any rate made his work more acceptable to general hearers by avoiding diffuseness and complexity. Miss Zimmermann was much applauded for her finished rendering of the Sonata, and we hope she will repeat it at an early date. No word of comment is needed concerning Mozart's Quartet in word of comments necessary to the content of the co Monday, the 23rd ult., is the latest we can record this month. It commenced with Dvorák's Quartet in E flat (Op. 51), a work accepted at first with some hesitation, but which is now taking its place among the most individual creations of its gifted composer. The first and last movements impress at once, but the second and third need familiarity for the full realisation of their beauties. It was a treat to hear one of Weber's Sonatas once more, but the commendation which should be given to Mr. Max Pauer for his choice can scarcely be extended to his performance. The work needs greater warmth and dignity than he infused into it, particularly in the second and third movements. The rendering of the final Moto con-tinuo was more satisfactory. Madame Néruda played her brother's Ballade in G minor, and the Concert concluded with Beethoven's Sonata in A, for piano and violin (Op. 30, No. 1). Miss Liza Lehmann, the vocalist, has a thin but well-trained soprano voice.

not been heard at all, and they might be drawn upon from time to time with advantage. M. de Pachmann introduced Brahms's Scherzo in E flat minor (Op. 4), an early pose) is the one sanctioned by custom and approved by work, but one upon which, as the programme annotator vocal and instrumental solos. The entrepreneurs having engaged an orchestra of first-rate constituent elements, and having, moreover, secured the services of eminent vocal and instrumental soloists, success, from an artistic point of view, lay in the hands of the chosen Conductor of these forces. We may say at once that Mr. George Mount, who conducted the first two Concerts which have so far taken place, although wanting somewhat in the firmness and perspicuity required of the general in command, justified, on the whole, his selection. In the second Concert, more especially, when he had become more fully used to his followers, a better and more com-plete rapport between the two was evident with correspondingly good results. The first Concert (7th ult.) opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusina" Overture, which was followed by the third movement, superscribed "Procession of the conquerors to the coronation at Rheims," from the symphonic poem "Johanna d'Arc," by Moritz Moszkowski, One of the features of the Concert was the spirited performance of Mr. Ebenezer Prout's new Symphony, conducted by the composer. We have so fully commented upon this work, on the occasion of its recent first performance at Birmingham, that it will be sufficient now to add that it fairly aroused the enthusiasm of the present audience, who vociferously recalled the composer at the conclusion. Mr. Prout may indeed be congratulated upon a most musicianlike production. During the same evening Herr Emil Bach gave a very smooth and refined rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, the Concert concluding with Liszt's stirring first Hungarian Rhapsody. Mr. Maas was the vocalist.

The most important item in the programme of the second Concert was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, one of those monumental works in musical art from which we must, for a long time to come, derive our standard in judging the productions of the day. It was admirably played by the orchestra, most of whose members know the work, so to speak, by heart. Miss Agnes Zimmermann produced a special effect and gained well-Miss Agnes deserved applause in her brilliant rendering of Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 45), one of the most congenial works of this class which we owe to that pianistcomposer, and the peculiar difficulties of which the lady surmounted without any apparent effort. The opening number of the programme was Goldmark's Overture "Sakuntala," an interesting and cleverly wrought specimen of modern descriptive music, illustrative of Kalidasa's Indian Drama "The Recognition of Sakuntala," a work which certainly deserves to be more frequently heard, as indeed does the same composer's symphonic work "Die ländliche Hochzeit." M. Massenet's orchestral prelude "Le dernier sommeil de la Vierge," which followed the Overture, pleased so greatly by its placid grace and refinement that it had to be repeated. The movement forms a part of the French composer's Sacred Legend entitled "La Vierge," French composer's Sacred Legend entitled "La Vierge," and is scored for stringed orchestra only. Mdlle. Marie di Lido gave, with good expression and vocalisation, Mendelssohn's Scena "Infelice," and the Recitative and Air "Whither away my heart," from Mr. Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty." An Overture in E flat, by Mr. Edwin Ould, was placed at the end of the Concert. It is a bright and spirited work, albeit not betraying any particular depth of thought or feeling, and well merited the hearing it obtained.

We understand that the prize offered by the concert-givers for a new Pianoforte Concerto, to be performed at the last Concert of the series, has been gained by Mr. Oliver King; Mr. Cusins having been the judge.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Noticing the first Concert of the short autumn series, we pointed out the adherence of Herr Richter, or his manager, to routine, and said that the selection of the programmes seemed to be a remarkably easy matter. Nothing has since occurred to make inopportune a repetition of our remarks. Herr Richter goes on moving round in a very narrow circle, only now and then recognising the not of the most exalted character. His audience may also desire it, and, in that case, so much the worse for them. especially as they have fallen into the very fault of narrow and exclusive preference so often charged against those who swear by the classical masters, and look distrustfully upon modern pretensions.

The programme of the second Concert was agreeably distinguished by the presence of one unfamiliar worknamely, an Andante and Variations for strings and two horns, from one of Mozart's Salzburg Divertimenti. It is a beautiful example of the master's ingenuity and skill, but unfortunately for Herr Richter's choice, it was never intended to be played by a little army of strings. The work to which it belongs has a place in the category of chamber music, whence we humbly submit, it should not have been taken. Herr Richter, in fact, made a raid upon the province of Mr. Arthur Chappell, as though his own proper domain were not large enough. It may be said that the Conductor wished to show off his strings by way of answer to certain criticisms upon them. That is right enough, but not at the expense of Mozart, whose two horns were almost inaudible amidst the din of many fiddles and basses With Mozart's comparatively unimportant piece thus presented, the interest of novelty began and ended. For the rest, the programme contained the Overture known as "Leonora, No. 2," which always seems to be overshadowed and dwarfed by the majestic "No. 3." This is the reason, perhaps, why it is heard but seldom; Concert managers naturally preferring the greater work of two constructed with the same material. Taken by itself, the No. 2 is, however, a noble example of Beethoven's finest manner. Brahms's Second Symphony (in D) was also performed, and with it the sensational duet from "Die Walkure," in which Wagner, Pagan at heart, so coolly ignores the moral sentiment of a Christian age. This was very finely sung by Madame Valleria and Mr. Lloyd, and no less finely accompanied; Herr Richter's orchestra being always heard at its best when the music in hand is that to whichwhether with a due sense of proportion or not-he has devoted so much of his time and talent. The reading of Brahms's Symphony had no special character.

The final Concert of the series took place on the 11th ult., and was very well attended, the main attraction being Beethoven's Choral Symphony, with which, as usual, was bracketed a selection from Wagner, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" being thrown in by way of prelude to the whole. It is quite useless to multiply words about a programme so familiar as this. We may say, however, that the Wagner pieces somewhat bored even the special audience to whom they were addressed; proving once more that, apart from one or two selections, it is unadvisable to take scenes from this master's music-dramas for Concert use. They are not meant to be so given, and less than any operatic morecaux with which we are acquainted do they submit to it. The vocalists engaged on this occasion were Misses Sherwin, Friedlander, and Little, Messrs. Bernard Lane and Watkin Mills. Herr Richter's reading of the Choral Symphony is now so well known that description can hardly be needed. Some part of it we approve highly, that of the slow movement especially, but as to certain other parts we are bound to express complete dissatisfaction. treatment of the Scherzo, for example, seems to us a grave mistake. Beethoven never intended the Trio to be hurried at Herr Richter's speed. Its character is lost, and it becomes to a large extent unplayable. This has often been pointed out to the Viennese Conductor, who, however, perseveres with the courage of his convictions. About the vocal portion of the Symphony the less said the better. Neither soloists nor chorus were up to the level of their exacting task.

THE HECKMANN QUARTET.

IT cannot be said that the public has so far displayed a vast amount of interest in the performances of this troupe. At the first Concert this season on the 14th ult., the fact that it does not bound the whole world of good music.

He finds this, perhaps, the most profitable course in a pecuniary sense, and, if so, it constitutes a reason, though is to be attributed to lack of interest in quartet music generally, or to a failure to recognise in Herr Heckmann's party the superlative qualities with which they have been credited, is open to question. Perhaps both causes have something to do with the state of things above indicated. It may be freely affirmed, that in some respects the players are unsurpassable. In the three Quartets performed on the 14th—viz., Schumann's in A (Op. 41, No. 3), Brahms's in A minor (Op. 51, No. 2), and Beethoven's in C (Op. 59, No. 3)—the perfect unity of method, and the even balance of tone were very striking, and in the fiery last movement of Beethoven's work, the admirable execution excited the audience to a remarkable degree. But where individual feeling and expression are needed, as in the Andante of the same work, or the whole of Schumann's Quartet, the cold passionless accuracy was by no means all that was required to give the full effect to the music. In their way, these German artists are beyond criticism; but theirs is not the only, nor perhaps the best, way.

MR. DANNREUTHER'S MUSICAL EVENINGS.

THE sixteenth series of these interesting performances commenced on the 5th ult., when two novelties were brought forward. Mr. Dannreuther endeavours to make his programmes valuable to musicians by including the latest works of living composers, and it is not his fault if they do not prove to be masterpieces. On the present occasion he introduced a Pianoforte Quartet in F, by Gernsheim (Op. 47), a composer who has not succeeded in establishing a reputation on this side of the channel. Several of his chamber works have been heard at the Popular Concerts, and a Violin Concerto at the Crystal Palace, but they have excited no enthusiasm, for the reason that they suggest labour rather than inspiration. Kapellmeister music may win admiration for its technical excellence, but it can never touch the heart. On this account the Quartet in F was coldly received by an audience specially trained to appreciate the utterances of the modern German school. There are some expressive ideas in the third movement, Andante cantabile, but on the whole the work is dull and uninteresting. On the other hand, two new songs for contralto, with viola obbligato, by Brahms (Op. 91), may be numbered among this distinguished composer's most charming inspirations. They were finely sung by Miss Lena Little, and are likely to be often heard. Beethoven's great Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), and Schumann's Trio in D minor (Op. 63), were included in the scheme.

There were no absolute novelties in the second Concert, on the 19th ult., and it is therefore only necessary to mention the works performed, which were Dvorák's beautiful and original Pianoforte Quartet in D (Op. 23); Schumann's rarely heard Sonata in A minor (Op. 105), for pianoforte and violin; and Brahms's Trio in C (Op. 87).

HERR PEINIGER'S RECITALS.

GENERAL interest in what may be termed archaic music has greatly increased of late, and the Recitals, or rather Chamber Concerts, given by Herr Peiniger at the Steinway Hall, have secured large audiences. At the second performance, on the roth ult., the ancient was strongly leavened by the modern, the former being only represented by items of Bach and Caspar Fritz. Madame Frickenhaus joined the concert-giver in a pleasing Piano and Violin Sonata by J. O. Grimm (Op. 14), composer of the well-known Suite in canon form; and among other modern pieces were a piquant Serenade for piano and two violins by B. Godard, and two well-written trifles for four violins by Mr. A. Burnett, composed expressly for learners. The third Concert, on the 24th, had a more important programme. The antiquarian portion of the scheme consisted of an Andante and Allegro from a Concerto for strings, by Michael Festing, one of the founders of the Royal Society of Musicians; a Sonata for harpsichord and violin, by C. R. Burney, son of the musical historian; a Presto from a String Concerto, by Hellendaal; and a song by Dr. Blow. Mr. Fuller-Maitland presided at the harpsichord, which was one of Kirkman's instruments, dating from 1798. In effective contrast was a new unpublished Sonata in D minor, for piano and violin, by M. Saint-Saëns, played by the composer and Herr Peiniger. It is a clever and effective work in four movements, the last of which pleased so greatly that it had to be repeated. An Allegretto Scherzando for Strings, by Herr F. Praeger, also obtained a favourable reception. The support accorded to Herr Peiniger has induced him to announce a series of matinizes to take place in the ensuing spring.

M. DE PACHMANN'S RECITAL.

THE very large audience that attended St. James's Hall on the 11th ult., proved that the Russian pianist has gained a high position in public favour, and we are not disposed to cavil at the fact. Unlike his distinguished fellow-countryman, Rubinstein, M. de Pachmann does not impress by mere force or compel admiration by displays of superhuman skill. He is content to charm by the most refined and delicate methods, and it is impossible to imagine pianoforte-playing more free from the sensational element. That he does not interpret every class of music with equal success may be admitted, but it is better to excel in one branch of art than to be mediocre in all. In music belonging to what may be termed the Chopin genre, M. de Pachmann has no living rival. His touch is said to resemble that of the Franco-Polish composer in its velvety softness and singing quality. In addition to several excerpts by Chopin, the pianist was heard to the greatest advantage in an Etude of Moscheles and Henselt's favourite, "Si oiseau j'étais." In the fugue from Raff's Suite in E minor (Op. 72) a sudden loss of memory compelled him to stop and recommence. This was the most pelled him to stop and recommence. This was the most honest course to pursue, though we have known several pianists who, when the victims of a like accident, have extemporised until they picked up the thread, on the reasonable supposition that few among the audience would then notice the flaw. Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, No. 2) should not have been selected to play the people in, and, while we are objecting, let a strong protest be recorded against the modern improvements made in Weber's familiar Rondo Brillante in E flat. Why poor Weber, who was a master of the art of writing for the pianoforte, should be so frequently caricatured in this way it is difficult to explain.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITALS.

THESE excellent artists gave the first two of a series of Vocal Recitals last month, on the 10th and 24th respectively, at Prince's Hall, to fairly numerous and highly appreciative audiences. The title of Drawing-room Meetings would, but for the locality in which they are held, perhaps more accurately describe the character of these delightful rencontres, where the usual formalities are almost entirely dispensed with, Herr Henschel acting both as his own "conductor" and accompanist on these occasions. As regards the undertaking of the last-named office, in the case of his individual vocal contributions, only a musician of Herr Henschel's consummate ability dare venture upon such an experiment (the book being, moreover, entirely dispensed with), and the result completely justifies the attempt. The genial German baritone's admirably-trained voice appears to have suffered somewhat in its sympathetic timbre during his prolonged sojourn in the United States, but his interpretation of songs of different styles and periods is as refined and as truly artistic as ever. Madame Henschel, on her part, wins golden opinions of her audience; more especially in the chanson and the lied, and wherever her delivery is not over-weighted by elaborate bravura passages. There is no lack of variety in the programmes, the items in which range from Carissimi, Cimarosa, Bach, and Handel, to Auber and Boieldieu, Schubert and Franz, Corder and Villiers Stanford; and also include some duets, which form not the least attractive feature of these unique entertainments. The third Recital is announced to take place on the 1st inst.

LONDON SELECT CHOIR.

THERE is a certain capriciousness in the ways of those who provide for the musical wants of the public. It was recently remarked that the number of our leading Oratorio Societies in London was decreasing for no apparent reason, and with equal inconsistency they are now adding to their numbers with a zeal which calls for sympathy, and hope that the new ventures will meet with the support they deserve. The London Select Choir is an outcome of the institution known as Mr. Willing's Choir, but its ranks have been enlarged as well as revised. Mr. Cusins is now the Conductor, and the first Concert at St. James's Hall. on the 24th ult., augured well for the ultimate success of the enterprise. Two works were performed—namely, Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" and the "Lobgesang." The interest attaching to the first work has increased since the distinguished French composer has devoted his energies mainly to sacred music, and diligent students may trace the germs of the finest ideas in "The Redemption" and " Mors et Vita" in this early Mass, composed many and "Mors et vita" in this early mass, composed many years ago. With respect to the performance, it is possible to speak in terms of scarcely qualified praise as regards the choir. When the first nervousness had been conquered, the singing became noteworthy for good intonation, spirit, and accuracy. Unquestionably, the London Select Choir has the making of a choral force capable of holding its own with any similar body in London. The orchestra was somewhat slovenly, the nuances being but ill observed, especially in the Mass. Mrs. Hutchinson sang charmingly, and Mr. Lloyd and Mr. F. King also acquitted themselves thoroughly well in their respective parts.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

It is encouraging to learn that, in spite of adverse social and political influences, this Society has commenced what promises to be one of the most successful seasons it has ever enjoyed. Certainly a prospectus that includes "The Rose of Sharon," "Elijah," and the Choral Symphony must be considered specially attractive, and the result is a largely increased subscription, as well as a greater number of applications to join the choir. The first Concert took place on the 2nd ult., when the works performed were Schubert's Mass in F and Mr. Prout's Cantata "Alfred." It is not a little singular that the former, which is one of its composer's most beautiful compositions, should never have been heard at the West end, and we can only ascribe this neglect to ignorance on the part of conductors. Though the Mass is the earliest of the six which Schubert wrote, it ranks next to the one in E flat in musical merit as well as churchlike dignity. It was composed in 1814 for the centenary festival of the parish church of Lichtenthal, near Vienna, and the composer conducted the performance. The chief characteristics of the work are an abundance of chaste, refined melody, and a generally subdued style quite in contrast with the Masses of the earlier masters. The orchestration is full of Schubertian touches, especially in the writing for the wind. The only elaborate movement is the "Cum Sancto Spiritu," a really excellent fugue for a youth of seventeen. The rendering of this was the best feature in the Hackney Society's performance, though the whole was good, the only thing left to desire being a more careful observance of piano and pianissimo. But the choir was heard to greater advantage in "Alfred," a work full of stirring music, needing good attack and vigour for its execution-qualities which distinguish Mr. Prout's forces. Their enthusiasm communicated itself to the audience, who applauded lustily; a special furore occurring after the popular March. Miss Clara Leighton, Miss Amy Foster, Mr. Selwyn Graham, and Mr. Bridson were the principal vocalists of the evening, the first and last in the order named being the most commendable.

A STRING QUARTET BY STERNDALE BENNETT.

THE first performance, in all probability, of a String Quartet from the pen of the late Sir Sterndale Bennett, is an event demanding something more than a mere passing notice in these columns. It appears that in the year 1831 Bennett, being then a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and in his sixteenth year, tried his hand at an artform, requiring above all others the firm footing and clear perception of the master, and the result was the composition of a String Quartet in G major. As Bennett was all his life singularly free from self-conceit, it is probable that he but presented by the composer to a fellow-student, Mr. John Gledhill, and lost sight of until recently, when it attracted the attention of a pupil of his, Mr. Wingham. Owing to this gentleman's efforts on behalf of this relic from the pen of his beloved master, the Quartet was included in the performance of Bennett's music held at the Little Oratory (Brompton), on Sunday, the 22nd ult., in celebration of the Feast of St. Cecilia, the Patroness of the Oratorium Parvum. In speaking now of the Quartet itself, it will scarcely be supposed that a very important addition has been made thereby to the already published works of the master, taking into consideration the early age at which it was written. But neither can it be said that an indiscretion has been committed in bringing to light a composition which its author evidently did not regard as bearing the stamp of maturity upon it. The Quartet in G (the only work of the kind which Bennett is known to have written) is in fact a highly interesting production, as showing the precocious talent and the ideal strivings of its composer, as well as demonstrating beyond doubt upon what models this youthful mind had been forming itself before his mature genius soared into regions as yet unexplored by others. In listening to the four orthodox movements of the Quartet-Allegro moderato, G major; Adagio, E minor; Minuetto, E minor; and Allegro, G major—we can fancy papa Haydn frequently nodding approval to the young composer who had studied his own style to such good purpose. But we have here not merely imitation of a chosen model, but an almost marvellous penetrative insight on the part of one so young into the spirit of this model. Thus the third, and more especially the final movement, albeit wanting in elaboration of themes and general harmonious proportioning of the parts, are so truly conceived in Haydn's "vein," as to render them distinctly remarkable productions in themselves, sufficiently so as to have justified any one in predicting for their composer a most brilliant career. For further details respecting it, we may refer our readers to the able analysis of the work from the pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, recently published by Messrs. Novello. It is to be hoped that a public opportunity will ere long occur for presenting this interesting only String Quartet of Sterndale Bennett to English amateurs. It will prove to them, that in concentrating his efforts thus early upon so abstract and difficult an art form, the composer was animated by the truth of that maxim, which recommends itself to all students-viz., Res severa verum gaudium.

TALLIS COMMEMORATION SERVICE.

It was right that the 300th anniversary of the death of Thomas Tallis should be observed at St. Alfege Church, Greenwich, where the composer lies buried, and no other method was possible than that of holding a Commemoration Service. Tallis is rightly termed the father of English Church Music, and, with the exception of his unique "Song in forty parts," revived a few years ago by Mr. Leslie's Choir, his works are not suitable for the concert room. Although Tallis was a voluminous composer, very little of his music is to be heard even in our Cathedrals, and we should have preferred a festival on a more imposing scale than that which was held on the 23rd ult. However, we must be thankful for small mercies. The authorities of St. Alfege did what they could in inviting the choirs of St. Stephen's and St. Mark's, Lewisham, All Saints', Blackheath, and other churches, to take part in the service, and in restricting the music to that of Tallis himself. It included the beautiful setting of the Litany, which has never been equalled by modern composers; the anthems, "Hear the voice and prayer" and "If ye love Me"; the Te Deum from the complete service in the Dorian mode, and three hymns. One of the latter was the Old Hundredth, which, though commonly ascribed to Tallis, was certainly not composed by him. The singing was generally excellent, but the organ accompaniment was little better than a series of jerks and spasms, the staccato touch being absurdly out of character with the grave, dignified harmonies interpreted by the choir. A sermon looked upon this early work merely as an exercise. At was preached by the Dean of Manchester, and a collection any rate, so far as we know, it was not even tried over, made in aid of the church renovation fund. In honouring the memory of a great composer, the promoters of the festival did not therefore let the opportunity slip for doing a stroke of business, music being once more made the handmaid of charity.

MR. JOSIAH BOOTH'S "NEHEMIAH."

IF any musicians attended the performance of this work at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, on the 17th ult., expecting to hear an oratorio planned on the scale of Mendelssohn, Mackenzie, or Gounod, they must have been profoundly disappointed. The first few numbers sufficiently showed that Mr. Booth had no thought of measuring himself with these or other composers when he began to write "Nehemiah." But it must be remembered that what is done at St. James's and the Albert Halls is but an infinitesimal part of the musical work that goes on in London. There are numberless humble associations which need music such as we find in this work, and it is for these that Mr. Booth has catered, and catered successfully. Nehemiah is a fine figure in Old Testament history, but Mr. Foxwell, who has arranged the libretto-a mixture of Biblical text and smoothly written verse-has not attempted to invest his subject with any dramatic interest. composer has been equally modest, the simplicity of the airs and the hymn-like character of most of the choruses being evidently intentional, and not the result of musicianly weakness. A pleasant flow of quiet melody pervades the work, and occasionally we meet with some freshness of idea. The Oratorio, the place, and the audience were well suited to one another, and it was easy to gather that the crowded assemblage was pleased, for the request to abstain from applause was only obeyed with the greatest difficulty. In all respects justice was done to the music by the performers. Miss E. Howes, Miss E. Dones, Mr. Lewys, and Mr. Alfred Moore were all admirable as the principals, and the South London Choral Association, which has successfully rendered the works of the greatest masters, of course found no difficulty with the choruses. The composer supplied a masterly organ accompaniment.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

THE local Concert season has now fairly commenced, and it is satisfactory to note that although entertainments of a trivial character still abound, there is an increasing volume of high class music and a public ready to support it. Popular success is still reserved for miscellaneous Ballad Concerts; but the attendance at several recent Concerts of a classic character was larger than might have been anticipated, and the patronage of such entertainments may be expected to grow with the diffusion of even such elementary musical knowledge as is being afforded here, by the Midland Insti-tute, to some twelve hundred learners of both sexes in the vocal and instrumental classes.

There was an excellent muster of the lovers of instrumental Chamber Music, on the 7th ult., at the first Saturday Afternoon Concert of the musical section of the Midland Institute, when the programme comprised, among other noteworthy items, Beethoven's String Quartet in F (Op. 18, No. 1), Spohr's Duet for violin and viola in E minor (Op. 13), and Schumann's Pianoforte and String Quartet (Op. 43), and Schumann's Planforte and String Quartet (Op. 47). Miss Clara Surgey was the vocalist, and sang, with good effect, Gounod's song "The Worker," and Sullivan's "My dearest heart." Herr Petterson (violin) delighted the audience by a masterly performance of Tartini's "Trillo del Diavolo," and in the concerted pieces was ably supported by Mr. A. W. Langston (pianforte), Mr. F. Ward (violin), Mr. T. M. Abbott (viola), and Mr. A. I. Priestley (violongello)

A. J. Priestley (violoncello).

Nothing daunted by the unsatisfactory financial results of his catering last year, Dr. Swinnerton Heap commenced a fresh series of Instrumental Chamber Concerts on the 6th ult., when the executants were Mr. Carrodus and Mr. Speelman (violins), Herr Bernhardt (viola), M. Vieuxtemps (violoncello), and Dr. Heap (pianoforte). Dvorák's Trio for pianoforte and strings in F minor (Op. 65), which was introduced here in May of last year, opened the Concert, and appeared to give even greater satisfaction than on the marked individuality bewildered almost as much as they pleased the audience. Haydn's String Quartet in F (Op. 77, No. 2) was like spoon meat after the subtleties and mannerisms of Dvorák's work, but the relief was not unwelcome, more particularly as the performance was a fine one. Schumann's grand Quintet for pianoforte and strings in E flat (Op. 44) brought the Concert to a brilliant close, every movement of this noble and impassioned work being rendered with irreproachable skill and appropriate feeling. Mr. Carrodus gave a very finished performance of the familiar Romance and Tarantelle, by B. Tours, and Dr. Heap introduced a new Pianoforte Fantasia in F minor (Op. 35), by Mr. Charles H. Banister, which, though somewhat conventional in style, commended itself to every one as a thoughtful and scholarly work.

Cherubini's grand Requiem, in D minor, for a three-part chorus of male voices, was performed for the first time in Birmingham, at the Edgbaston Oratory, on the 13th ult., at a Mortuary service for the "Old Boys" of the school, at which Cardinal Newman and Mr. Edward Bellasis, the biographer of Cherubini, and himself an "old boy," were present. The choir was a special one, selected and conducted by Mr. Stockley, and the organ was in the competent hands of Mr. Langston. Although the work was performed without the band accompaniments, and, therefore, shorn of much of its due effect, the congregation present was deeply impressed by its beauty, solemnity,

One of the best Saturday Concerts given by the Birmingham Musical Association since it commenced operations, was that which took place in the Town Hall on the 14th ult., when Haydn's "Creation" furnished the subjectmatter of the entertainment. The performance devolved upon the band and choir of the Association, which are rapidly acquiring strength and consistency, and three local principals-Miss H. Johnson, Mr. C. Banks, and Mr. W. Evans, whose qualifications are above the average order. The choral singing generally was excellent, and "The heavens are telling" and "Awake the harp" were specially effective, but the playing of the band still leaves a good deal to be desired in the string department. Mr. Stimpson rendered valuable assistance at the organ, and Mr. C. J. Stevens conducted.

The second of Messrs. Harrison's Popular Subscription Concerts, which took place in the Town Hall on the 16th ult., was very similar in composition to the first, and it is uit, was very similar in composition to the man and the scarcely necessary to add, therefore, that the attendance was again very satisfactory, the hall being filled in every part to overflowing. Madame Albani filled the position occupied by Madame Patti on the previous occasion, and delighted the audience by her finished rendering of Bellini's "Casta Diva," Haydn's "With verdure clad," Gounod's "Nella Calma" Valse, and Brahms's "Guten Abend," in all of which perfect phrasing and charm of voice were allied to refined expression. Miss Gertrude Griswold exhibited excellent phrasing and execution in Mercadante's "Soave immagine d'Amor," and pleased the audience so much in a quaint song by Hope Temple, "An old garden," that she was recalled and sang An old gaden, that she was recalled and sang a new song by Cowen, "If love were what the rose is." Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. Maybrick were effective as usual in their various selections. In the instrumental department, the honours of the evening were carried off by the veteran contrabassist, Signor Bottesini, whose performance of two movements from his own Concerto in F sharp minor, Paisiello's air "Nel cor piu," with variations, and the "Carnival of Venice" roused the enthusiasm of the audience to the highest pitch. Signor Papini's playing of a new Fantasia on Scotch airs for violin and a Caprice Fantastique by Antonio Bazzini, was marked by rare delicacy and purity of tone and finish of execution.

After temporary retirement in order to recover the losses of previous musical campaigns, the Philharmonic Union has this season come to the front again with spirit unabashed and an organisation stronger than ever. For the initial performance of the new series, which took place on the 20th ult., Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was chosen. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Lea, Miss Ada Iggulden, Mr. Hagyard, and Mr. Watkin Mills, and the band and chorus, first occasion, when its many novel points and strongly numbering over 300 performers, were under the able direction of Dr. Swinnerton Heap, the Society's Conductor. The choral singing, though good on the whole, was somewhat unequal, owing, as it would appear, mainly to a want of balance in the different voice sections; but for a first attempt, the results were very satisfactory. The playing of the band was occasionally a little rough and unsteady, indicating the want of additional rehearsal, and that was possibly the explanation of the inequality observable in the choral performance. Miss Annie Lea, in the principal soprano music, won a great deal of applause; but though her voice is a pleasing one, the lady has still a good deal ner voice is a pieasing one, the lady has still a good dear to learn in the way of expression and execution. She was most effective in the music of the Widow. For such an air as "Hear ye, Israel," she lacks volume of voice and breadth of style. The artistic interest of the Concert centred in Mr. Watkin Mills's assumption, for the first time here, of the part of Elijah. Unfortunately, on this occasion he was evidently suffering from a cold and was unable to do himself justice; but he was thoroughly successful in the more subdued and pathetic numbers, such as "It is enough" and "For the mountains." Mr. Hagyard possesses a tenor voice of pure and sympathetic quality, which was displayed to good advantage on this occasion in "If with all your hearts," and "Then shall the righteous," and Miss Iggulden, whose voice is more of a mezzo-soprano than a contralto, pleased the audience greatly by her singing of "O rest in the Lord."

Of the second Concert of the Festival Choral Society, which took place on the 26th ult., when Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," Spohr's "God Thou art great," and Mendelssohn's eight-part Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," were performed, particulars must be reserved for my next.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

DURING November our Concert season has rapidly matured, and now on all sides music resounds.

Mr. Hallé, commencing his twenty Subscription Concerts on Thursday, October 29 (with the aid of Madame Albani), afforded his patrons admirable performances of Beethoven's Symphony in A, and of Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto. Since then we have greatly enjoyed Mendelssohn's "Soctch" Symphony, Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings (substituted for Dvorák's "Legende," the parts of which did not arrive in time), Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, No. 1, and, to a lesser degree, Raff's "Hungarian Suite" (Op. 194). The last-named work gave another evidence of the extraordinary industry and learning of a man who just failed to reach the very front rank among composers. Possessed, as Raff was, of great fertility of idea, of considerable constructive power, and of admirable command of orchestral resources, his larger works almost invariably produce a somewhat soporific effect, conveying the idea of musicianlike skill rather than of inspiration.

Perhaps, as Mr. Hallé gives only eight Choral Concerts during the season, and as his position here almost precludes the possibility of any other attempt at the adequate rendering of important works of the oratorio class, it was hardly fair to give the "Creation," especially with a cast so much weaker than heretofore. Certainly the performance—either of solos or choruses—was not of such merit as to reconcile us to the repetition of a work which, with all its smoothness and prettiness, may now be allowed a

As if to make amends for some shortcomings in his first choral undertaking, Mr. Hallé promised for the interpretation of Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," on the 26th ult., Madame Albani, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, so that the work, so successful at Birmingham, ought to be adequately rendered, and impressive, here. At the second Concert, the picturesque Concerto in G minor of the same author excited great attention, and, especially in the second and third movements, considerable pleasure, although a want of breadth of subject and style-consequent upon the brevity of all the principal themes and their fragmentary treatment-was felt. Besides the vocalists already mentioned, Manchester public more boldly than before, and Madame Maria de Lido has materially increased her reputation. Madame Norman-Néruda has been welcomed by her many friends and, in Rode's Concerto in A minor, shown the refinement and grace that have so often charmed them, in the rendering of Wieniawski's "Legende" and "Mazourka" also displaying a versatility and freshness that delighted her audience.

Mr. De Jong's regular fortnightly Concerts continue to attract remunerative audiences. During the month, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Signori Bottesini and Papini have again proved their popularity. A young soprano—Miss Sherwin —surprised us by her beautiful voice and style, and a contralto—Miss Roberts—also new to Manchester, although scarcely powerful enough for the Free Trade

Hall, displayed considerable promise.

A by no means successful experiment was made at a so-called "Special Working Men's Concert," on October 31, when, a charge of one shilling being made to "all parts of the hall," and an extra fee of another shilling being demanded for a numbered seat, the working man severely absented himself; and, as there was no orchestra provided, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Miss Cravino, Messrs. Sidney Tower, Franklin Clive, and Tito Mattei failed to draw any considerable number of the lazier kind of people, who are supposed not to toil or spin. It is presumable that the charge to "working men" will revert to the old level.

At the "Gentlemen's" Subscription Concerts, two orchestral performances have been given, and Mr. Halle's Pianoforte Recitals have proved as attractive as ever. In the same hall the Vocal Society, under the direction of Mr. Henry Watson, Mus. Bac., announced its second public performance for Wednesday, the 25th ult., and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel a Vocal Recital for the 27th.

Mr. T. A. Barrett has commenced a new series of cheap Concerts on alternate Monday evenings, and by providing a military band, a small choir, and a large staff of local vocalists with a London star, has drawn very large audiences. With these undertakings, the performances on alternate Saturdays under Mr. De Jong's guidance, and the Weekly Concerts directed by Mr. Cross at the Association Hall, the humbler patrons of music cannot complain of a neglect of their tastes and wants.

And, in quite a different sphere of art, I note that Messrs. Risegari, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps announce their perseverance in the praiseworthy attempt to popularise chamber music, and their intention to give, with the aid of local pianists, three Concerts during the season.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL. (FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

LIVERPOOL'S musical record for the past month not only includes the usual classical and other performances, which have attracted fairly numerous audiences at the Philharmonic Hall and elsewhere, but derives more than usual importance from the fact that it marks a distinct epoch in the history of one of our foremost local societies.

We have not for some months commented upon the proceedings of the Philharmonic Choral Society, for the simple reason that, whilst continuing its rehearsals with a brave spirit, it was a well-known fact that it was all the time making a bitter struggle for existence. It will be within easy recollection that this Society was the outcome of a difference with the parent stem, the Philharmonic Society, and with a purely choral basis for its foundation, it was projected to give a series of oratorio performances in St. George's Hall. Aided by an unprecedented enthusiasm on the part of the musical public, the first season's record-1883-4-stood out in brilliant contrast to any previous effort of the kind, and stamped the Society as approaching the highest standard which it was possible to attain. Stimulated by its success, a second series of Concerts, upon a similar scale, was given during the following season. The selection of works, however, particularly for the first performance, although admirable in themselves from an artistic point of view, turned out to be a fatal mistake on financial grounds, and the great axiom has again asserted Madame Biro de Marion has displayed some skill as an itself with bitter irony that Liverpool, with its business executant, Mr. Clifford Hallé has claimed the favour of the instincts, will not patronise novelties until it is satisfied (NOËL.)

that they have received general approval by constant performance—that is, until they are no longer novelties.

The performance referred to entailed a heavy loss, and was the precursor of a diminished patronage during the remainder of the season, the result being a large deficit and a call upon the guarantors to the full extent of their liabilities. All this tended to damp the ardour of the members, but at the commencement of the present season strenuous and repeated efforts were made to secure for the Society a satisfactory financial basis, to enable them to continue their services and to avert what would otherwise have been a serious musical loss to Liverpool. All these efforts, however, only ended in failure, and the idea of raising a new guarantee fund had reluctantly to be abandoned. It was apparent that beyond a comparative few the musical enthusiasm of the city was at a low ebb, and it could scarcely be expected that the members, in addition to giving their services, could sustain any loss which further Concerts might involve. In this predicament the Committee resigned, deeming it best to make an honourable surrender to the exigencies of the situation rather than tarnish the past record of the Society by a weary and waning existence. A letter at this time, how-ever, from the Conductor, Mr. Randegger, who has throughout been the great mainstay of the Society, induced the Committee to withdraw their resignation, and with Mr. Randegger's generous assistance, both with his own services and those of competent artists, it is now intended to give a performance of "The Messiah" in St. George's Hall during the course of the present month, which it is hoped will be the inauguration of a new and vigorous lease of life on the part of a Society which has done such good work in the

The first Concert of Mr. Hallé's series was given in the Philharmonic Hall, on October 27, and deserved the lavish patronage bestowed upon it, not only on account of the engagement of Madame Albani—an important attraction in itself—but because of the intrinsic merit of the instrumental portion of the programme. Beethoven's Grand Concerto, No. 4, in G major, and Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony in A minor, constituted the chief items, and their rendering came near perfection. The programme also comprised the Overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "Tannhäuser," sufficiently illustrative of two distinct schools of thought; and Mr. Hallé, in addition to playing the pianoforte in the Concerto, conducted the entire performance. Madame Albani, who was in excelent voice, gave as her selections the aria "Casta Diva," from "Norma"; Handel's "Sweet Bird," and Gounod's "Ave Maria," the obbligato accompaniment to the latter being entrusted to Herr Straus.

The second Hallé Concert took place on the roth ult., with Madame Norman-Néruda as solo violinist. Her performance of Beethoven's Concerto in D merits primary attention, and its changing features were executed with perfect skill. Madame Néruda's other items were by Wieniawski—(a) a "Legende" in G minor, and (b) a "Mazourka" in G major. The Symphony was Schubert's No. 8, in B minor. Madame Biro de Marion was the vocalist, and her selections included examples of Weber, Beethoven, and Hérold.

At the third Concert of the Philharmonic Society, on the 3rd ult., Haydn's "Creation" was given. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Ludwig-Mr. Piercy in the tenor music making a most favourable impression. The work of the chorus and band was, on the whole, satisfactory, although the hurried tempo of one or two of the most prominent numbers-notably "The heavens are telling"—somewhat detracted from the dignity of the performance. At the following Concert of this Society, which took place on the 17th ult., the chief attraction was the return visit to Liverpool of M. Vladimir de Pachmann. The eminent Russian's powers of execution are still the theme of wonderment, and the facility with which he disposed of the difficulties bristling throughout Mozart's Concerto in D minor, again proved his claim to be considered an artist of the very highest order. M. de Pachmann's subsequent soli, and especially Henselt's Study, "Si oiseau j'étais," which had to be repeated, furnished examples of the delicious ease and delicacy which pervades all his performances. He was accorded a most hearty reception. Mdlle. Maria de Lido was the vocalist, and in her various songs evidenced a faultless style and intonation. The orchestral items comprised the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," selections from Wagner's comic opera "Die Meistersinger," and Cherubini's overture "Elise."

The Caledonian Choral Union, a newly-formed Society, gave its first Concert at Walton, on the 6th ult., and the performance included a rendering of Handel's Cantata "Acis and Galatea." Mr. R. V. McCulloch conducted, and, although subject to certain blemishes, this first appearance of the Society promises to be the augury of a useful and satisfactory career.

A "Bottesini" Concert, promoted by Messrs. J. B. Cramer and Co., took place at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 20th ult., and as its advertised title would indicate, its chief importance was due to the engagement of the unrivalled double-base virtuoso. His performances are usually confined to his own compositions; but in this instance, in addition to a "Bolero" and a duet for violin and contrabasso, he combined with Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Signor Papini in a scholarly rendering of the Allegro agitato and Adagio from Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. The vocalists comprised Miss Gertrude Griswold, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. Farley Sinkins.

The first of a series of four Subscription Concerts was given at the Birkenhead Music Hall on Wednesday, the 1rth ult. These Concerts were promoted two or three years ago, with the object of providing Birkenhead with classical chamber music of the first order, and have successfully adhered to this intention. The programme in question included Schumann's String Quartet in A minor and Mozart's Duo for piano and violin in D, and from the fact that the artists comprised Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé, Messrs. Speelman, Straus, and Franz Néruda, it is superfluous to state that the performance was one of the highest excellence. Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist.

The production at the Royal Court Theatre, on October 30, and again on the 16th ult., of Gounod's 'Faust' by the Liverpool Amateur Operatic Society, created somewhat of a stir in musical circles. Whilst the temerity, and, on the whole, general capability of the performers is worthy of praise, the event only tends to demonstrate the depth of the gulf which separates amateurs from professionals in this, the highest test of musical and histrionic ability. Mr. A. Morch, in the character of Mephistopheias, and Miss Hallwood as Siebel, were particularly effective, and with the assistance of an efficient orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. J. O. Shepherd, there was a singular absence of amateurish hitches.

MUSIC IN THE WEST. (From our own Correspondent.)

MUSIC seems to be in a state of preparation in Bristol just now, and very few Concerts have been given lately. The chief event has been the first of Mrs. Viner Pomeroy's series of four Chamber Concerts, which took place on the 10th ult., and was held, as usual, in the smaller of the Victoria Rooms. There was a somewhat larger attendance than is sometimes the case, though this, unhappily, does not mean that the room was full. The executants were Mr. Henry Holmes (first violin), Mr. John Pardew (second violin), Mr. Ellis Roberts (viola), and Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello). The first piece, Haydn's Quartet for strings in C major, No. 32, evidenced a sad want of rehearsal, which at one time amounted to a breakdown. The next number, Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor, for piano, violin, and violoncello, was splendidly played. Mrs. J. L. Roeckel was the pianist, and her fine performance of her most difficult task was quite beyond criticism. Mr. Pomeroy then contributed an Adagio by Bargiel as a violoncello solo, which was much appreciated; and the remaining item, Beethoven's Quartet in A major, No. 5, for strings, was very well rendered and much enjoyed.

Organ Recitals were given by Mr. George Riseley at Colston Hall, on October 31, and the 5th, 7th, and 14th ult. The members of the Bristol Musical Association gave their Thirty-fifth Popular Concert on the 21st ult., when Colston

Hall was densely crowded. The Concert was above the average in point of merit and evidently gave great satisfaction. The vocalists were Madame Wilson-O Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable. Wilson-Osman, programme was miscellaneous, and perhaps was the more popular for that reason. The band and chorus were highly efficient, and during the evening Mr. G. Riseley contributed two organ solos, which were enthusiastically applauded. Mr. G. Gordon conducted.

Mr. Augustus Aylward gave an Organ Recital in the Congregational Church at Salisbury, on October 27, assisted by Miss Amy Aylward as vocalist. The programme included Triumphal March ("Naaman"), Costa; Berceuse, Delbruck; Gavotte, Henschel; Invocation, Guilmant; Coronation Anthem, Handel; and songs by Gounod, Pinsuti, Randegger, &c. The church was well filled, and the Recital was a great success.

A Concert was given in the Hamilton Hall, Salisbury, on the 3rd ult., in aid of the Fund for the Restoration of St. Martin's Church. The Concert was under the patronage of the Earl of Radnor, and was well attended. The principal attraction was the performance of a Cantata, "The Pilgrim's Progress," by Edmund Rogers. The work was satisfactorily rendered by a band and chorus of about seventy performers, gathered from the various societies of the city. The principal vocalists were Mrs. E. Steward, Mr. R. Hunt, Mr. Walter Howgate, and Mr. Arthur Crick. Mr. Alfred Foley was the leader of the band. Miss Grace Harding presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Charles Rogers at the organ. At the end of the performance the composer, who conducted, was warmly and deservedly applauded. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, the most interesting item being Mr. Alfred Foley's violin solo, Spohr's "Barcarole," which was rendered in a highly finished manner.

The last of Miss Aylward's series of Concerts of chamber music for the present season was given in the Salisbury Assembly Rooms, on the 13th ult. The attendance was scarcely so good as usual. The Concert opened with Rheinberger's Quintet in C, for piano, two violins, viola, and violoncello, of which a very satisfactory interpretation was given by Miss Aylward, and Messrs. A. Burnett, C. Gamblin, Ellis Roberts, and W. E. Whitehouse. Mr. Whitehouse gave a finished and sympathetic rendering of Marcello's Sonata in G, for the violoncello. One of the most enjoyable features of the Concert was Miss Aylward's pianoforte solos—Schumann's Romance in F sharp (Op. 28) and the Allegro from his "Fashingsschwank aus Wien," both of which were played in a most artistic both of which were played in a most artistic manner. The other items of the Concert were Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, and Dr. Villiers Stanford's Quartet in F. Special mention must be made of Mr. Burnett's playing in the Adagio and the Allegro of the "Kreutzer" Sonata, and of Miss Aylward's really splendid interpretation of the pianoforte part of Dr. Stanford's Quartet, especially in the Scherzo, Adagio, and Finale. As a whole, the Concert formed a very satisfactory and worthy conclusion to the excellent series of the present season.

The Plymouth Vocal Association are busy rehearsing Cowen's "Rose Maiden," and other works by Cowen and Löhr, which will be given at their next Concert, on the 9th inst. Great interest is felt in this Concert, as Mr. Cowen will conduct his own compositions. The artists engaged are Miss Ada Patterson, Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. Barrington Foote, and Mr. French Davis (harp), and there will be a complete band and chorus. This Concert will be the first of the nineteenth season of this Association.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

EVERY seat in St. George's Hall, Bradford, had its occupant on the occasion of the first Subscription Concert of the season, held on October 30. The Subscription Concerts attain their majority this year, and the institution was never so successful. The work selected for performance—Berlioz's "Faust"—had been heard on two previous occasions in Bradford, and amid such demonstrations of approval that the committee had no hesitation in putting it forward for a third time. The Bradford Chorus, or, to an exceptionally brilliant pupil at the Royal Academy, and speak more accurately, the members of the Festival Choral attracted favourable notice by his early efforts in creative Society, of which Mr. Burton is the Conductor, did their work splendidly, both in the difficult numbers, such as the Finale to the second part, and the more refined choruses. which appear so frequently in the book. The orchestra was Mr. Halle's, and it need scarcely be said that their interpretation was a triumphant realisation of the art of tone painting, for the exhibition of which perhaps no work affords more scope. The part of Mephistopheles was undertaken by Herr Henschel, whose appearance in a fresh rôle, so far as Bradford people are concerned, was regarded with much interest. His fine voice told with much effect upon the audience. Of Mr. Lloyd's tenderly-conceived Faust, and the vocal purity and pathos of Miss Davies's performance of Marguerite, nothing new can be said. The small part of Brander was assigned to Mr. Kingsley, who acquitted himself creditably. Mr. Hallé was the Conductor. The second Concert, which took place on ductor. The second concert, which took place on the 20th ult., was devoted to chamber music, Mr. Charles Hallé, as usual, having the direction and a large share of the practical work. Two important works stood at the beginning and end of the programme, namely, Mozart's Sextet in B flat (No. 25), and Brahma's Piano Quintet in F minor (Op. 34). Although both works were somewhat marred by the movements of a section of the audience—the late arrivals and the early departures they created impressions which will outlast many other fine things which the season has to offer in Bradford. To characterise the performance, it is sufficient to say that Mr. Charles Hallé—to whom cultured amateurs are indebted for many opportunities of studying the works of Brahms — Madame Norman-Néruda, Signor Risegari, Herr Straus, and Herr Franz Néruda, were the executants. In addition to the four last-named artists, Herr Paersch and Signor Preatoni assisted in Mozart's Sextet. Mr. Hallé played with his accustomed finish Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 81), and Madame Norman-Méruda afforded a happy contrast of her usual style in the rendering of a Legend and a Mazurka by Wieniawski. Herr Franz Néruda, who, in a sense, filled the place of Signor Piatti, proved an admirable substitute for that artist, and his performance of a couple of morceaux by Popper was such as to ensure him a cordial welcome should he ever again visit Bradford. The vocalist was Madame Valleria, who was heard at her best.

At Bradford, Herr St. Hensé gave an attractive Concert on the 11th ult.. On that occasion Signor Risegari and M. Vieuxtemps, with Mr. Empsall and Mr. Sewell-two well-known local artists-assisted him in the performance of several important works, not to say novelties. Among other examples were Beethoven's String Quartet in G, and other examples were Beethoven's String Quartet in G, and Schumann's "Stücke im Volkston," for piano and cello (Op. 102), both of which were interpreted with clearness and fervour. Three selections from Ernst and Heller's "Pensées Fugitives," by Herr St. Hensé and Signor Risegari, and a "Spanisches Quartet" by Madame Herritte-Viardot, the gifted teacher of singing of Frankfort, concluded the Concert. Herr St. Hense's pianoforte solos were a Nocturne by Chopin, and two of Heller's pieces.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Gade's "Psyche" in St. George's Hall, on the 13th ult. The choral work, it need scarcely be said, was in good hands; the singing being well up to the Bradford standard, both in respect of tone and power. The rendering of the beautiful prologue of "Psyche" may be specially referred to as combining delicacy and refinement, well worthy of the subject. Miss Thudichum sang the soprano solo music of both works with spirit and refinement, and, generally, gained much by her visit. Mr. Valentine Smith essayed the tenor music very creditably, and the baritone solos of Mr. L. Williams were much appreciated. Miss Clara Myers, as contralto, betrayed a slight nervousness, but on the whole sustained the music allotted to her with credit. Miss Clara Jowett rendered the subordinate soprano solos with much acceptance. Conductor was Mr. Burton.

An exceedingly interesting Chamber Concert was given on the 9th ult., in the Albert Hall, Leeds, by Mr. F. Kilvington Hattersley. Readers will scarcely need to be told that Mr. Hattersley is a Yorkshireman, who became art, and notably by his setting of the 97th Psalm. Mr. Hattersley did his audience at Leeds the honour of placing before them a fresh contribution from his pen to English music, in the form of two sketches for the pianoforte, entitled "The Legend" and "The Village Fountain," and he was also responsible for two other items which appeared in the programme, namely, a Vocal Serenade, with violin obbligato ("The Tribute of Love"), and the first movement of a Trio in D minor for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello. Mr. Hattersley's technical ability is perhaps the best feature of these compositions, albeit there is freedom of imagination and an elevated purpose which promise much for the character of future work. The sketches are very pretty and fanciful, and the Serenade is marked by great refinement, but the Trio falls short of the lofty aim apparently sought to be achieved. Apart from Mr. Hattersley's place in the programme the Concert was a remarkable one by reason of the appearance of Mr. Walter Bache, a virtuoso who is rapidly securing the sympathies of a considerable section of Yorkshire musicians. Of course Mr. Bache's energies were devoted to the exposition of Liszt, and his wonderful solos created the usual amount of astonishment, and as much for composer as for executant. Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor had an appropriate place at the head of the programme, and Sir George Macfarren's Trio in E major and E minor was also included, the performers in each instance being Mr. Bache, Mr. Francis Ralph in each instance being Mr. Bache, Mr. Francis Rapin (violin), and Mr. Whitehouse (cello). Mr. Ralph rendered with nice feeling and great technical skill, a Violin Sonata by Tartini, and Mr. Whitehouse played a Hungarian air by Fischer. The vocalists were Miss Kate Winifred Payne and Miss Hilda Wilson, who in addition to solos, contributed one of the most agreeable performances of the evening in the shape of two duets by Dvorák. Mr. Hattersley, I hear, is about to settle in Leeds.

The Leeds Philharmonic Society gave an exceptionally fine performance of "Elijah" on the occasion of its first Concert of the season, in the Coliseum, on the 11th ult. The commodious building was crammed. There was no lack of choral power, and it was of a refined description. The principals were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Rees, Mr. S. Jackson, and Mr. F. King, all of whom did justice to the work, though Mr. King scarcely seemed in his best form. Mr. Alfred Broughton was the Conductor, and is to be congratulated on having produced the Oratorio in a degree of perfection such as is seldom equalled. Mr. Alfred Benton rendered good service at the organ, and the band was well balanced. An extra Concert is to be given on the 23rd inst.

Chamber music continues to extend its domains in Yorkshire, and, considering the competition in other departments of music, may be said to have a fairly successful time of it. At the Philosophical Hall, Leeds, Messrs. Haddock and Dawson continue their weekly Concerts in presence of moderate audiences, who derive a vast amount not only of enjoyment, but instruction, from the performances. Although the selections are necessarily limited, the whole world of creative art is made to pay tribute. The seventh Recital, which took place on the 19th ult., and which may serve as a specimen, included Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violin (Op. 96), Gade's Sonata in D minor, a Sonata by Handel—that which was transcribed for the violin by David—a Fantasia by Vieuxtemps, and one or two pianoforte solos from Mendelssohn, including his Andante and Rondo Capriccioso.

The second of the Leeds Popular Concerts was given on the 18th ult. in the Coliseum. The temperature of the building was on this occasion much more agreeable; there were no draughts, and the construction of a permanent orchestra, upon which had meanwhile been erected an organ, not only added to the appearance of the place, but vastly improved its acoustic properties. The leading attraction of the evening was the presence of M. Saint-Saëns, for whose services at the Concert Leeds musicians are deeply indebted to Mr. Rawlinson Ford. The programme was lengthy, but M. Saint-Saëns was identified in some way or other with almost every item, and not in one department alone, but in every one of the versatile forms of his genius. His creative gifts were exhibited in the performance of the Piano Quintet in B flat (Op. 41), and of a pièce d'occasion in the shape of a Violin Sonata by Herr Peiniger; and his executive ability took the form of organ and pianoforte solos. His performance at the organ revealed him in his best mood, and opened out that rich vein of improvisation which he possesses in a commanding degree. Associated with him in the carrying out of the programme were MM. Peiniger, Parker, Gibson, and Ould, the first and last-named of whom contributed solos. Miss Hope Glenn was the vocalist, and sang with much acceptance. Mr. Alfred Broughton was the accompanist.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical performances in Edinburgh during the last month have been numerous and varied. The Edinburgh Select Choir began with "Elijah," under the conductorship of Mr. Henry Hartley. Considering the small number of voices, and that the work was new to the Society, the performance was satisfactory formance was satisfactory.

Mr. Millar Craig and Miss Noble gave, on the 2nd ult., in the Freemasons' Hall, the whole set of Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin." Although these songs are familiar. enough, still the rendering of the whole in one evening was a novelty to an Edinburgh audience. Mr. Craig and Miss Noble both sang with much feeling, and the Recital gave pleasure to the listeners, who were numerous and attentive. Mr. Thomas Craig accompanied.

On the 3rd ult., Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Messrs. Bottesini and Papini gave a Concert in the Music Hall. Miss Zimmermann was, as usual, enthusiastically received, the highly-developed technique of her pianoforte playing being thoroughly appreciated. In her rendering of Jadassohn's Scherzo, and of one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, she realised fully the ideas of the composers. She also sustained the pianoforte part with Signor Papini, in the "Kreutzer" Sonata, and in one movement of Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. Signor Bottesini played compositions of his own, a Bolero and a duet for bass and violin; Signor Papini gave as his solo a Fantasia on Scottish airs, which, as usual, when national melodies are played, obtained from the audience the most enthusiastic applause; and Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Griswold, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Maybrick, contributed solos with their usual success, several encores being demanded.

The long-anticipated arrival of Dr. Hans Richter and his orchestra filled concert-goers with delight, and the two performances given here may be said to have far exceeded expectations. Wagner was prominent in the programme, and the faultless rendering of his compositions under so celebrated a Conductor must have made converts of many hitherto hostile. Strange to say, of the many selections the "Walkurenritt" obtained most applause, and the loudly demanded encore was only withheld on account of the want of time. The remainder of the programme comprised selections from the "Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," "Tannhäuser," and "Parsifal." At the first Concert, Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, and the C minor Symphony were performed, and at the second the Seventh Symphony. The rendering of the latter was almost perfect, and bore testimony both to the efficiency of the instrumentalists and the Conductor's knowledge and love of the works of the great master. Liszt's first Hungarian Rhapsody, played with surpassing delicacy and brilliancy, delighted the audience, as the charming rhythm of the Czardas cannot fail to do when rendered with such Miss Lena Little gave songs by Gluck, Handel, verve.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda paid Edinburgh their visit as usual at this season. Conspicuous as novelties in the programme were Brahms's Scherzo in B flat minor, and a Sonata in C minor, by Emmanuel Bach, for violin and piano. The Concert was much enjoyed.

On the 18th ult. the Heckmann Quartet, engaged by the Philosophical Institution, gave a Concert in Queen Street Hall, with Madame Sophie Lowe as vocalist. The programme included works by Beethoven, Schumann, Haydn, and Brahms. Of the last mentioned composer, Madame Sophie Löwe sang three songs, one of which,

"Sonntag," made a most favourable impression on the audience, who insisted on an encore, which was granted. At the Concert on the following day, the vocalist was Signor Alberto Bach.

At Sir Herbert Oakeley's first Organ Recital in the music class-room of the University, the programme included a Concerto by Corelli, a Motett by Haydn, and Minuet in E flat by Beethoven. A feature of the Recital was the appearance of Madame Marie Roze, who sang Mozart's "Voi che sapete," Sir H. Oakeley's romance, "La fiancée du Marin," and Weber's "Softly sighs" (with organ accompaniment) in a manner which evoked the utmost enthusiasm.

Herr Alfred Gallrein (violoncellist) gave the first of a series of Chamber Concerts, in the Freemasons' Hall, on Saturday, the 21st ult., when he was supported by Mr. Colin Mackenzie, who has lately returned from Frankfort (where he has been studying with Herr Herrmann), a lady amateur (piano), and a local vocalist. The principal works performed were Beethoven's Trio, C minor (Op. 1), and the same composer's Sonata for violin and piano (Op. 12).

On the same day Mr. Carl Rosa's English Opera Company terminated a fortnight's engagement at the Lyceum Theatre. The operas new to Edinburgh were "Manon" and "Nadeshda." The latter seems to have been most successful, and " Carmen," as usual, attracted larger audiences than any of the other works.

The Choral Union Concerts will begin on the 9th inst., the work selected for the opening Concert being Mr. A. C Mackenzie's Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," which will be given under the conductorship of the composer, MUSIC IN GLASGOW AND THE WEST OF SCOTLAND.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Two Concerts by Herr Richter's orchestra were given in St. Andrew's Hall, on October 27 and 30 respectively. Expectation was raised to a somewhat high point, but unfortunately for the success of these Concerts a very indifferent, or at any rate unequal, band was brought down. The performances suffered in consequence not only in regard to execution, but, the fact of the inferiority of the orchestra having become known, in regard to attendance also. The programmes of the two Concerts were voted a little heavy, consisting, as they did, chiefly of Wagner excerpts.

Notwithstanding the depression of trade, the subscriptions to the Choral Union series of Choral and Orchestral Concerts are, I am glad to say, exceedingly encouraging. There is nothing further yet to be said with regard to the arrangements, the scheme for the Saturday evening series not having been sufficiently matured for publication; I may, however, say that the choral element may, not improbably, have a fuller place in it than hitherto.

On the 5th ult. a Ballad party, comprising Miss Gertrude Griswold, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. J. W. Turner, and Mr. Maybrick; with Miss Agnes Zimmermann, Signori Papini and Bottesini, instrumentalists, gave a Concert in St. Andrew's Hall, in presence of a comparatively small audience. The character of the vocal selections had no doubt much to do with the poor attendance. Our better class amateurs are beginning to see through and despise the royalty system of song-singing, and not even the undoubted legitimate attractions of the instrumental party, nor the artistic position of the vocalists themselves, seemed to be sufficient to modify the feeling.

It is true that a somewhat similar, if rather higher class of Concerts, of which a series was given during last month on Saturday evenings, in St. Andrew's Hall, was comparatively very well attended; but it is to be remembered that these entertainments are primarily intended for persons of as yet uneducated taste and limited means. At the Concerts referred to, which are under the auspices of the directors of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union, such excellent artists as Madame Patey, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Mary Davies, and Signor Foli, were engaged. A novel feature was the appearance of a small instrumental party, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Cole, whose selections were choice and classical.

Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda gave a Concert here on the 13th ult. in the Queen's Rooms, which was well attended.

It is announced that Señor Sarasate will appear in Glasgow on February 28, and M. de Pachmann on March 22 and April 5 of next year.

A new Choral Society has been formed in Glasgow, bearing the name of the West of Scotland Choral Union. It will be conducted by Mr. H. A. Lambeth, Mr. J. T. Pye, F.C.O., being accompanist.

The Glasgow Academy Choir, which continues under the earnest and skilful training of Mr. John MacLaren, will this season take up Herr Gustav Ernest's recently published Cantata "Love's Conquest," together with a selection of part-songs. The choir numbers about eighty boys, with a tenor and bass contingent of old pupils of the Academy. Special attention has been more particularly given of late in the Academy to instrumental as well as vocal music, piano and violin classes having been recently formed.

The Hillhead Musical Association, which is now in its fourteenth year, will this season give as its principal work Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter." Mr. W. T. Hoeck is the

The Musical Association of Queen's Park United Presbyterian Church, which is under the direction of Mr. W. T. Hoeck, have selected Alfred Cellier's setting of "Gray's Elegy," which they no doubt consider grave enough for performance in a church, the views of some of our Scotch dissenting sects being pretty easy on this subject.

The Dennistoun Musical Society, I am sorry to say, has ceased to exist. It was under the conductorship of Mr. T. S. Drummond, and showed good taste, as a rule, in its selections. The district is a populous and not uncultured one, and should not be without some society of the kind. Weber's Mass in G will be revived by Greenhead United Presbyterian Church Musical Association, Mr. Inglis, Conductor. The Society performed this composition some years ago with marked success.

A new Choral Society, of a more public and comprehensive character than the Association under Mr. McNabb, has this season been formed in Bothwell, Mr. McHutcheson having undertaken to train it. ' About seventy members have joined. It is called the Bothwell Choral Society.

At Kilmalcolm, fifteen miles from Glasgow, now a beautiful residential place for Glasgow merchants, though but recently a "deserted village" of the humblest kind, was given with considerable success, on the 5th ult., a Concert of instrumental and vocal music, the selections being marked

Three Concerts are to be given in Greenock by the Glasgow Choral Union Orchestra during the season, those being the first appearances of the band in the important town at the mouth of the Clyde. Greenock had the curious and enviable distinction at one time of being the only place in Scotland, excepting Edinburgh, where a Quartet Concert could be heard occasionally.

In the ancient and historical town of Dunfermline an amateur Orchestral Society of some considerable attainment is in active existence. There are thirty-four members, and it is trained and conducted by Mr. W. H. Cole, or Glasgow. The No. 1 Symphony of Beethoven is being studied at present; also the D minor Concerto of Mozart, the Overture to "Il Barbiere," &c.

A Concert of Chamber Music was given in the Corn Exchange, Alloa (situated on the Forth), on the 6th ult., by Mr. Cole and party. The programme comprised two Quartets by Schubert, Haydn's "Hymn to the Emperor" Quartet, in G, by Raff, and a Polonaise by Wieniawski (Mr. Cole), and other choice selections.

The Glasgow Society of Musicians are to entertain Mr. Mackenzie on the occasion of his being here to conduct his Oratorio "The Rose of Sharon."

Every Saturday afternoon and Monday evening, Concerts are being given at the Water Colour Society's Exhibition by a select orchestra, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Cole. Overtures and excerpts from Symphonies, Suites, &c., together with an occasional chamber piece, such as Schubert's Octet, Quintets and Quartets by Thomas, David, and others, form the programmes.

MUSIC IN MUNICH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE recent production of two new works on the same evening at the Hof-Theater in Munich was signalised by a great success. The first of these was "Der faule Hans," by Alexander Ritter; the second, "Der Barbier von Bagdad," by Peter Cornelius. It is of the last-named work that the present article treats.

It is eleven years since the composer died—twenty-seven since this opera was completed and brought out at Weimar by the discerning and indefatigable exertions of Liszt, ready as he has ever been to acknowledge genius, and to lend it a helping hand. More shame, therefore, to the musical apathy which, when this little gem had once seen the light, could permit it to be buried away again for nearly three decades; and all thanks and honour are due to Hof-Capellmeister Levi, who, on this occasion, has brought the work to a new birth. That it will hold its own henceforth on the German stage is predicted in glowing terms by the Allgemeine Zeitung, from which the following is quoted :-

"The 'Barber of Bagdad,' in its declamation, in the close connection of word and tone, in the importance allowed to the orchestra, in the freedom of its harmonisation, and in the organisation of the whole, stands upon the footing of the musico-dramatic principles of Richard Wagner, to which Peter Cornelius attaches himself with the enthusiasm of conviction; but this work, which originated ten years before the 'Meistersinger,' possesses at the same time, like every creation of a genius, complete and visible independence both in invention and form. Peter Cornelius has composed his own text, and has thereby shown himself as a master in the realisation of the language for comic purposes. There is no trace of symbolising, or of the representation of the universal through the individual, as in 'Der faule Hans'; reflection has nothing to do with the 'Barber of Bagdad.' And it belongs to the sphere of the comic, that it makes us forget the before and the after, the height and the depth of life, and enchains us to the here and now.

"And in the delineation of the comic element, Cornelius has, both musically and dramatically, kept within the limits of the beautiful. The Barber is no caricature to make us shake with laughter, but a comic figure placed in the right light, which forces a smile from us whether we will or no.

"Besides a rich creative phantasy, the 'Barber of Bagdad' shows a wonderful mastery of technique, by which the composer makes light of the most difficult problems of harmony, and with the utmost freedom and boldness in modulation, yet holds the opera from beginning to end within the limits of what sounds well, and is truly musical."

We learn from a private source that the result surpassed all anticipation, and that there was but one opinion about the work. On all sides exclamations were heard—" How beautiful! How is it possible that the work has remained so long in oblivion?"

Liszt was present at the second performance, coming direct from the station to the theatre, after his long journey from Weimar, to do honour to the memory of his old friend. For Peter Cornelius, though here almost unknown, and in Germany hitherto far too little appreciated, belonged to that renowned little circle of musicians, which counted Wagner and Liszt as their head, and included such names as Tausig, Bülow, and the subject of the present article.

OBITUARY.

WITH Gustav Adolph Merkel, whose death occurred on October 30, at Dresden, a gifted and earnest worker in various departments of our art has passed away. Born in the year 1827, at Oberoderwitz, in Saxony, the native soil of many a distinguished organist and contrapuntist, it became Merkel's privilege to carry on in modern days the best traditions of a school at the head of which stood the great Johann Sebastian Bach himself. Destined by his parents to follow the profession of a schoolmaster, it was not until his twenty-sixth year that he began to devote himself entirely to the art he loved, studying counterpoint under Julius Otto, and laying the foundation for his subsequent fame as an organ player under the guiding hand of the celebrated Johann Gottlob Schneider. Robert Schumann, too, extended his generous sympathy and aid to the young artist who quickly made his way in his profession, and, after having filled one or two minor positions, was appointed Court organist at the Dresden Hofkirche, in which office he remained until his death. Merkel also conducted for a number of years the Dreysigsche Singakademie at Dresden, and in 1861 became a professor at the Conservatorium of that town. His compositions, both instrumental and vocal, are numerous, including sonatas, fantasias, preludes and fugues for the organ, solo pieces and duets for pianoforte, motetts, and songs. Indeed, considering the comparative brevity of his artistic career, the activity displayed by his pen is surprising; his most recently published composition—three pianoforte pieces entitled "Miniaturbilder"—bearing the Opus number 181. Thoughtful and of most musicianlike workmanship as all Merkel's productions are, his best efforts were probably bestowed upon those for his own instrument, his organ sonatas more especially being justly considered as inspirations of a high order, both in his own country and elsewhere. His life, although outwardly uneventful enough, was replete with those emotional experiences which make up the sum total of the creative musician's existence, and the result whereof he reveals to the world in his works. And there are those amongst the works of Gustav Merkel which will surely perpetuate his memory in the history of the art.

Antonin Dvorák's opera "Der Bauer als Schelm"-an early production by that gifted composer, and long since become popular in the Bohemian capital-was performed for the first time on the 19th ult., at the Hofburg-Theater, of Vienna, with a German version of the libretto. Its success, according to the Prague journal Politik, was complete, the overture, the ensemble numbers, and a loveduet, more especially, eliciting enthusiastic applause. Dr. Hanslick, the eminent critic of the Viennese Neue Freie Presse, expresses himself most favourably regarding the musical merits of the work, adding that if it should fail to maintain itself upon the répertoire it will be owing entirely to the feebleness of the book. The critic, moreover, strongly condemns the puerile demonstrations which, during the earlier part of the performance, threatened to mar the proceedings. It appears that, directly after the conclusion of the overture, a number of youths-students, it is said, of the University-attempted, by hooting, whistling, and other discordant noises, to drown the general applause, and to protest thereby "against the introduction into Vienna of the music of a Bohemian composer." They were, however, quickly silenced, and expelled from the house. incident has, no doubt, been much exaggerated on both sides, and the fact of its having been construed by some party journals into a "political demonstration," only serves to accentuate the existing ill-feeling between the Austro-German and the Czech elements in the Empire. To cite once more the words of Dr. Hanslick on this subject-" In the matter of art, we should exert our German nationality, in opposition to the Bohemian, as little as we do in the case of the Russian, the Polish, or the Hungarian artist."

The Members of the St. George's Glee Union, gave their 201st consecutive Monthly Concert on the 6th ult., at the Pimilico Rooms, Warwick Street. The first part of the programme contained the part-song "The Shepherd's Lament" (Henry Smart); a song from each of the following artists—Miss Maud Cameron, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, Mr. Reginald Groome (harp obbligato, Mr. H. Field), and Mr. Thurley Beale; and the air and chorus "Haste thee, nymph" ("L'Allegro"), Handel, the solo of which was sung by Mr. Reginald Groome. Handel's Serenata, "Acis and Galatea," occupied the second part of the programme, the solos being admirably rendered by the above-mentioned artists. The part-singing, by a choir of about seventy voices, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Monday, was excellent. Mr. F. R. Kinkee very ably accompanied throughout the evening, and Mr. H. King presided at the harmonium in the Serenata.

THE first performance in Australia of Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," and Barnby's setting of the 97th Psalm, "The Lord is King," was given by the Melbourne Philharmonic Society, on September 29, before a large audience. The local press is so enthusiastic upon Dvoràk's great work that henceforth there can be little doubt of the composer's name being as popular in Australia as it has now become in England and other musical centres. The Age says:-"Dvorák has made an intimate study of the words forming the basis of his work, and his musical phrases are instinct with the feeling thus acquired. The work is in ten num-bers, each, however, having a relationship with the rest in general tone, and the pathetic motivo forming the leading subject in the introduction and first chorus, 'Stabat Mater dolorosa,' is reproduced in the final number, 'Quando corpus,' though with widely different treatment. The choral portion gives evidence of experience in this branch of composition, and of imaginative power in the distribution of the parts. Not less able is the orchestral treatment, which forms, indeed, one of the principal features of interest in the work. The cultured musician is found in interest in the work. every bar of the composition, and in many places the ideas are extremely noble and impressive." The Argus, after criticising each number in detail, continues thus:-" Of the general characteristics of the composer's style above mentioned, we may trace many in the various numbers of which this 'Stabat Mater' consists—notably the abundant flow of fresh and characteristic melody, the remarkable facility in varying and developing motives, and in picturesque orchestration. This composer is one who writes sacred music in serious mood, and therefore we find that his fancy is restrained by the nature of his subject to simplicity, if not severity, of form. His utterances are direct, heartfelt, and fervent, reverent, spontaneous, and, in the musical sense, wholly unconventional." And the Daily Telegraph, at the conclusion of a long notice, speaks thus of the grand climax, 'Quando corpus,' the characteristics of the composer:-" In the massive effects, vocal and orchestral, which he obtains, the magnitude of his resources is fully displayed. The grand opening phrases for the soli, the splendid harmonies for the chorus, and the magnificent contrapuntal devices employed, leave no other feeling than one of wonder, that a man gifted with such sublime musical talent, should not have been forced into the light of fame and honour long before the rays of either penetrated an obscurity which should never have enshrouded him. To sum up the work as a whole, the chief features are its grave and impassioned character, and its marvellous instrumentation." Barnby's Hymn of course suffered by coming after so massive a work, but it made its mark, and was cordially received. "On its own merits," says the Argus, "it deserves cordial reception and hearty praise. In the solos for soprano, alto, and bass voices throughout the work, the composer has displayed aptitude for the invention of graceful and expressive tune and admirable feeling towards orchestral accompaniment, which he employs most felicitously. His choruses are fully written and flow freely, and it would seem that his powers as composer are developing towards still greater achievement." The principal vocalists were Miss Rosina Carandini, Miss Christian, Mr. Armes Beaumont, and Mr. H. G. Gooch, who were all highly efficient. We cannot conclude our notice without giving the utmost credit to the efforts of Mr. J. H. B. Curtis, Secretary of the Melbourne Athenæum, who, by his excellent translation of the Latin Hymn in the book of words, added much interest to the performance.

WITH a desire of encouraging the performance of his operas, "Jessy Lea" and "The Soldier's Legacy," Sir George A. Macfarren has consented to forego his performing rights in Words and Music until December 31, 1890. These operas having been originally performed in Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's Entertainment with only pianoforte accompaniment, an impression has gained ground that they are unavailable for performance with a band. Orchestral parts, however, of both works exist, and can be hired from the publishers, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. through whom also permission to represent the works may be obtained. The Royal Academy Committee have decided to give a public performance of "Jessy Lea" at the Haymarket Theatre, on the morning of February 11, 1886.

An Oratorio entitled "The Ascension," composed for the degree of Doctor in Music at Oxford, by Mr. Henry J. Edwards, Mus. Bac., of Keble College and Barnstaple, was performed in the Sheldonian Theatre, on the 6th ult. The soloists were Mrs. Hutchinson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Frederick King. The band was mainly composed of London players, with Mr. Burnett for leader, and the chorus included the pick of Oxford singers, professional and amateur. Of the work itself we may safely say that it was well worthy of a good performance. Doctors' exercises are apt to be more learned than pleasing, but a notable exception was found in Mr. Edwards's case. Though the Oratorio is comparatively short, comprising only eighteen numbers, remarkable variety is obtained, and the component pieces are fully and elaborately worked out. An introduction for orchestra is followed by contralto and bass solos, the latter with a chorus, both melodious and effective. The announcement "The Lord is risen," is made by the soprano in a somewhat florid air. The next point is a chorus set to Cardinal Newman's hymn "Praise to the Holiest in the height," in the course of which a masterly fugue with strettos of culminating closeness and brilliancy is introduced. A duet for soprano and tenor that succeeds is one of the least striking numbers, but interest was soon revived by a truly noble setting of "The strife is o'er," in admirable eight-part writing. This chorus made a great effect, but it was eclipsed by the next number, a tenor solo, which, in the hands of Mr. Edward Lloyd, became a veritable triumph both for composer and singer. The same remark applies to the contralto song with violin obbligato, "My Saviour, can it ever be," the words of which are taken from "The Christian Year." After a well-written quartet the composer gathers up his strength for the finale, which is of great length. It opens with an orchestral prelude, that served to bring out some charming scoring, this being succeeded by a soprano solo narrating the Ascension. A short duet for tenor and bass, to the words "Ye Men of Galilee," leads into a soprano solo and chorus, "See the Conqueror mounts in triumph"—perhaps the most effective number in the work-after which a fine fugue, ending in a most striking eight-part climax, brings the Oratorio to a close. The composer received a perfect ovation at the conclusion of the Oratorio. A better exercise for the degree of Doctor of music has not been produced for years, and it can scarcely be doubted that before long the work will be performed elsewhere.

THE Westminster Popular Orchestral Society gave its first Public Concert on the 9th ult., at the Town Hall. Westminster, amidst circumstances which augur well for the future prosperity of this young and ambitious institution. Founded in May last by fourteen experienced amateur instrumentalists (employés in the firm of Messrs. Broadwood) for the purpose of cultivating high-class concerted music, the Society has rapidly developed from its small nucleus into a complete orchestral body of sixty performers, led by Messrs. H. C. Tonking and C. W. Wade, and conducted by Mr. C. S. Macpherson. It is impossible not to admire the spirit which has prompted the formation of this scheme, within a stone's throw almost of the central musical attractions offered by the Metropolis, or, in view of the high aims implied by the constitution of the present programme, to withhold from it a large measure of our sympathy. Such works as Mozart's Overture to "Cosi fan tutte," the same master's Andante and Finale from Symphony in D (No. 46), Entr'acts and Ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," and Mendelssohn's "Athalie" March, bear witness to the sense in which the young institution desires to become "popular," and as the Conductor succeeds in getting his, as yet, somewhat untutored forces more thoroughly in hand, progress will doubtless be made towards a practical realisation of this laudable aim. While much of the ultimate success of the new enterprise will, of course, depend upon the support given it by the inhabitants of the borough itself, that support appears to have been freely bestowed on the present occasion, the hall being filled with an audience heartily applauding every number of a programme which, if anything, erred on the side of an embarras de richesses; vocal and instru-mental solos having been interwoven with the orchestral numbers already named.

THE Concert held at the City of London College on Saturday evening, the 21st ult., was undertaken by the students of the Popular Choral and Orchestral classes as a substitute for entertainments formerly given, but now for want of funds fallen through. Greater evidence of the substantial good wrought by the Popular Ballad Concert Society, at the East-end, could not be advanced than this willingness of the pupils to bear the monetary responsibility attached to concert-giving, and to appropriate the proceeds to benefit the General Fund. Benevolent schemes reach their highest aim when thus resulting in efforts of self-help. In the present instance the students took matters into their own hands, and guided by their instructor, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, and assisted by the honorary secretary, Miss Paterson, they brought the Concert to a financial success. The occasion afforded them as well an opportunity to display before their friends and the public the progress they had made in musical art. Their rendering of Leslie's part-song "The Pilgrims," was so highly appreciated as to lead to an uproarious demand for repetition. No less worthy was their vigorous and characteristic interpretation of Schumann's chorus "Gipsy life"; nor did the other pieces sung by them during the evening fall below a high standard of excellence. The following artists kindly assisted. Vocalists—Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Clara Stanuart de Caracassisted Vocalists—Madame Rose Hersee, Miss Ciara Agyers, Mrs. Mowbray Henderson, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Dyved Lewys, Mr. Bartram, Mr. Sydney Melnotte, Mr. Cubitt, and Mr. Prenton: Instrumentalists— Miss Sutton, Miss Edith Russell, Messrs. Kent, Sutton, Bock, Robinson, and Chester. Mr. W. Henry Thomas officiated as Conductor.

By a prospectus recently forwarded to us, we are informed that the New York season at the Academy of Music will commence on Monday evening, January 4, 1886, with a series of Operas to be sung in the English language by American vocalists, most of whom were born in the United States, the Musical Director and Conductor being Mr. Theodore Thomas. Ten works will be chosen for performance during the season from the following listfor performance during the season from the following list"Orpheus and Eurydice" (Gluck), "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (Nicolai), "Lohengrin" (Wagner), "Faust" (Gound), "Carmen" (Bizet), "The Taming of the Shrew" (Goetz), "The Barber of Seville" (Rossini), "Lakmé" (Délibes), "The Flying Dutchman" (Wagner),
"Oberon" (Weber), "The Marriage of Figaro" (Mozart),
"Leclair" (Halévy), "The Magic Flute" (Mozart), "The Huguenots" (Meyerbeer), and a work by Rubinstein, with The orchestra will be the well-known one other operas. of Mr. Theodore Thomas; the chorus will consist of one hundred voices, selected from four times that number; and the ballet has been entrusted to the thoroughly competent management of Professor Mamert Bibeyran. The season will extend through fifteen weeks, and include forty evening subscription and sixteen afternoon extra performances. It is obvious that a broadly American spirit has animated the direction of this movement, which we sincerely hope may meet with the success it unquestionably deserves.

AFTER the regretable omission of a season, those highly excellent performances of classical chamber music, the Denmark Hill Concerts, have been resumed. In the present instance, however, the series consists of but two Concerts, and instead of being, as before, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Chappell, are now privately conducted. At the first performance, given at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on the 10th ult., the places of the well-known artists of the popular Concerts were supplied by the celebrated Heckmann Quartet. The music for strings comprised Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1) and Haydn's Quartet (Op. 77, No. 2), the executants being in each case Messrs. Heckmann, Forberg, Allekotte, and Bellmann. That neither interpretation left anything to be desired in tone or ensemble, need scarcely be said, nor could the playing fail to elicit the warm manifestations of approval which were bestowed. Miss Margaret Wild contributed, with marked acceptance, a Study in Canon, and Novelette in D (Schumann), for pianoforte, and was also associated with Herr Heckmann in a successful rendering of Grieg's Sonata in F major. Miss Lena Little was the vocalist, singing in a most commendable manner several high-class songs by famous composers.

The Melbourne Argus says that at a meeting of the Music Trades' Association of Victoria, held on Monday, September 14, at Messrs. Glen and Co.'s music warehouse, Collins Street, the question of the importation of cheap German pianos was considered; and it was stated that a great deal of injury was being done to the legitimate dealers in pianos, owing to the practice which had been adopted by certain persons of importing inferior German pianos got up with very showy exteriors. The greater portion of such pianos, it was asserted, bore false or fictious names, and others were imported without names, and, in many instances, were passed through the custom houses by means of invoices, specially prepared, as being of the value of only from £12 to £15 each. After much discussion, the following motion, proposed by Mr. Allen, of Melbourne, and seconded by Mr. Sutton, of Ballarat, was agreed to, with only two dissentents:—"That when a favourable opportunity presents itself, the trade wait upon the Government to request that fixed rates of duties instead of ad valorem rates be imposed on pianos and organs." It was announced that the question of the amounts of the fixed duties would be considered at a future meeting.

It is very rare that a permanent record is required of anything that is done at Promenade Concerts, but there is no rule without exception. We have nothing to do with the motives which prompted Mr. Freeman Thomas to offer a prize of twenty-five guineas for an original Overture by an English composer. The fact that he did so is sufficient, and the response to his invitation was encouraging, no less than seventy-five scores being sent in. Each competitor was asked to name some musician whom he would prefer to be appointed umpire. Mr. Ebenezer Prout, having the largest number of votes, duly adjudicated, and pronounced in favour of an Overture which proved to be the composition of Mr. E. H. Thorne. The "poetic basis" of the work is Scott's story "Peveril of the Peak," and for the sake of local colour Mr. Thorne has introduced the old cavalier song "When the king enjoys his own again," of which he makes very clever use. A lugubrious them suggests the sour-visaged Puritans, and a more winning melody the love of Julian for Alice Bridgenorth. Though not strikingly original, the Overture is a musicianly work, and above the average of prize compositions. It was first performed at a special Concert, at Covent Garden, on October 29, and was favourably received.

SUNDAY the 22nd ult. being St. Cecilia's Day, was celebrated at St. Margaret Pattens Church, Rood Lane, Fenchurch Street, by appropriate music, Gounod's "St. Cecilia" ("Messe Solennelle") being sung in the morning, and after the evening service a special selection, consisting of two comparatively seldom performed works, Spohr's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," and Handel's Ode (to Dryden's words) on St. Cecilia," and Handel's Ode (to Dryden's Hymn to St. Cecilia," and Handel's Ode (to Dryden's Hymn, Master W. Croddock greatly distinguished himself, and he was also highly successful in the solos in Handel's work, including "What passion," "But oh, what art can teach," and "As from the power." Mr. E. H. Heathcote gave the tenor solos with taste and feeling. Mr. L. W. Hardy (of the Crystal Palace Orchestra) lent valuable help by his artistic playing on the Cornet, and Mr. Horace Buttery presided at the organ. The excellent Choir of the Church gave the choruses with good effect, and the services were thoroughly appreciated by a large and attentive congregation. Spohr's "Last Judgment" will be given during Advent.

A GRAND Evening Concert, in aid of the sisters of Nazareth House, Hammersmith, was given on the 18th ult., at the Albert Hall. The programme was of a highly attractive miscellaneous character, including vocal contributions by Madame Trebelli, Mr. Santley, and many other well-known artists, a remarkably fine violin performance of Vieuxtemps's "Rêverie," by M. Theodore Werner, and a heartily appreciated recitation given by Mrs. Stirling. It should be added that the whole of the expenses of this Concert were defrayed by Mr. John T. Peacock, of Hammersmith, and an anonymous friend, so that the gross receipts might be handed over to the above charity.

AT the thirty-eighth performance of new compositions held by the Musical Artists' Society, on the 14th ult., at Willis's Rooms, the following works obtained a first hearing-viz., String Quartet in G minor (George Gear), Pianoforte Sonata in D (W. H. Speer), Pianoforte Trio in E flat (W. Wesché), Duo Concertante, for pianoforte and violoncello (Sir A. Sullivan), three "Thought pictures," and Fantaisie-Etude for pianoforte (Tobias A. Matthay), String Quartet in G (Henry Baumer), Songs (Charlotte Gilbert, Francesco Berger, Ralph P. Dawes, and Emily Lawrence). Both the composers and the executants of these novelties had every reason to be satisfied with the appreciatory attitude of their auditors, a number of whom remained in their seats until the conclusion, at a late hour, of the performance. We may add, however, that the extreme length of the programme told somewhat unfairly against the composers whose works had been placed amongst the last in the order. The executive artists were Messrs. Wiener, E. Roberts, A. Wright, B. Albert, W. Wesché, T. A. Matthay, T. David, and D. Hart, Miss Edith Goldsbro', and Miss M. Cronin.

A VERY successful Concert was given in the Wycliffe Chapel, Commercial Road, E., by the Prize Choir, on the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. George Merritt, Choirmaster. Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," Farrant's Anthem "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake, "Prever arged the tempest," Haydn's "The Heavens are telling," and a vigorous composition by the Choirmaster, "Cry aloud and shout," were well sung by the choir. The artists engaged were Miss Dottie Howard, Miss Alice Davis, Miss Kerbey, and Mr. Charles Rowcliffe, all of whom were well received. The instrumental selections included Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo in E minor, finely given by Miss Bonallack, and the Adagio from Haydn's 7th Symphony, which was well played by Mr. G. E. Hedges. Mr. Merritt conducted throughout in a most careful and able manner. The accompaniments were excellently played by Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe, Organist of St. Luke's Hackney, and Mr. G. Hedges on the organ; and Miss Bonallack presided at the pianoforte.

Ar the first of a series of Chamber Concerts, given at Bromley, Kent, by Messrs. F. Lewis Thomas and William C. Hann, the programme contained, amongst other works of importance, Rubinstein's Sonata in D, for pianoforte and violoncello, which received a fine interpretation at the hands of the concert-givers. At the second, held on Thursday, the 26th ult., Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat, for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, was played by Messrs. F. Lewis Thomas, Ralph, J. Hann, and William C. Hann.—The programme of the Bromley Orchestral Society on Saturday evening, the 14th ult., embraced Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Beethoven's Overture "Prometheus," and Auber's "Sirene." In conjunction with this body of instrumentalists, the Choral Society is about giving Goetz's 137th Psalm, and Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The united forces, under the direction of Mr. F. Lewis Thomas, now number 120 performers.—The People's Concerts continue to be well attended, upwards of 700 persons being present at the last Concert to enjoy the performance of a programme which included Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S fourth and last series of meetings for the performance of Beethoven's works will consist of five Concerts, to be given at the Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, commencing on the 16th inst.; but as there remain only the last four Pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven to present to the audience, it has been decided to include the great Quintets of Brahms, Raff, Schumann, Rubinstein, Sgambati, the four Sonatas by Raff, for pianoforte and violin, and other works worthy of place in a classical programme. At the last meeting, Madame Louis will introduce Beethoven's thirty-three variations in C major (Op. 121). As heretofore, the instrumental pieces will be interspersed with vocal numbers; and as Beethoven's compositions in this direction have also been exhausted, specimens of the early Italian school of vocal music will be given by artists of recognised position. So excellent a scheme most forcibly appeals to all lovers of high-class music.

No more appropriate Christmas present can be imagined than the new volume of the "Girl's Own Annual," which, apart from the excellence and attractiveness of its numerous illustrations, contains a variety of matter, not only of intellectual, but of high moral worth. Musically it appeals to us with irresistible force, for original compositions by eminent writers are scattered throughout the book, and papers on various subjects connected with the art are contributed by Miss C. A. Macirone (whose thoughtful articles in last year's volume of this work were mentioned at the time in our Journal), Lady Benedict, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, &c. The volume is in every respect elegantly got up, and may be recommended as an ornamental, as well as useful, addition to the drawing-room table.

The newly acquired Hall of the Surrey Conservatoire of Music (hitherto known as St. Luke's Church) was opened on Monday evening, the 23rd ult., with a Pianoforte Recital by Mr. Tobias A. Matthay, Professor of the Royal Academy of Music, and of the Surrey Conservatoire, assisted by Miss Kate McKeill and Mr. W. Mackway. It has been arranged to have the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Conservatoire Home on Monday, the 7th inst., at 10 c'olock, by the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex. The President of the Conservatoire, Mr. Alderman de Keyser, will provide a déjeuner; a volunteer guard of honour will attend, and a select Concert by Madame Albani, Mr. Tobias A. Matthay, and others, will give éclat to the proceedings.

At the annual meeting of the stewards and subscribers of the Clerical Charity at Hereford, the accounts submitted showed that the subscriptions to the Charity had been fairly kept up to their usual amount, and that the receipts at the Festival of this year varied but slightly from those of the Worcester Festival of the previous year. They exhibit, however, a very satisfactory advance upon the receipts of the Hereford Festival of 1882, for which the Charity is mainly indebted to the zeal and energy of the large body of stewards of this year, and the kind co-operation of the citizens of Hereford. From the income thus accruing, the meeting was enabled to vote grants, amounting in the whole to £395, to 12 applications for relie—viz., two widows, nine orphans, and one clergyman in distressed circumstances.

UNDER the provisions of a Deed of Foundation executed by the Corporation of Trinity College, London, on March, 29, 1884, the undermentioned members of the College teaching staff (all of whom have held their respective appointments some time) have now been nominated and approved for the title and precedence of Professor in the College:—James Higgs, Mus.B., Counterpoint, Canon, and Fugue; Bradbury Turner, Mus.B., Pianoforte Playing; Edmund H. Turpin, Instrumentation. It is further to be understood that the appointment of Professor Higgs is to a Foundation Professorship, and that Professor Turpin continues to hold, in conjunction with the Chair of Instrumentation, the Lectureships in Musical Form and Musical History.

At the first examination for the degree of Bachelor of Music by the University of Trinity College, Toronto, held simultaneously in London and Toronto, the following were examined and approved:—Class :: James Stewart Henderson, J. T. Flitcroft, A. E. Tozer, F. W. Williams, A. E. Gregory, G. Havelock, H. W. Rogers, A. J. Beard, H. F. Henniker, A. J. Owen, S. G. R. Coles, C. H. H. Sippel, A. J. Phipps, J. Acton, F. N. Birtchnell, C. B. Bumstead, F. Dean, J. Bell, H. J. Vaughan, S. W. Lingard, F. J. Dugard, Miss L. Dickes, A. E. J. McCreary and F. P. Dean. Class 2: Rev. J. Cater, J. Palmer, W. A. W. Howlett, and J. Wilson. Class 3: Rev. A. W. Hedges, W. E. W. Stark, and H. J. B. Dart.

On Thursday evening, the 12th ult., Farmer's Oratorio, "Christ and His Soldiers" was given in Oaklands Chapel, Uxbridge Road, by a band and chorus of eighty performers. The leader of the orchestra was Mr. G. Humphreys. Mr. W. H. Carus, R.A.M., Organist of St. George's in the East, presided at the organ, and Mr. C. G. Bell, Organist of St. Philip's, Earl's Court Road, conducted. The work was admirably rendered.

The prospectus for the twenty-eighth season of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society announces eight Concerts, eight Rehearsals, and eight Matinées, to be given at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas. The programmes will include Handel's "Messiah," with Madame Fursch-Madi, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. William Candidus, and Mr. M. A. Whitney as principal vocalists; Gounod's "Morse tVita," Dvorák's Cantata "The Spectre's Bride," and the same composer's Symphony in D minor, Raff's "Die Tageszeiten," for chorus, pianoforte solo, and orchestra, and several standard works of the highest interest.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Stephen's, South Kensington, on St. Simon and St. Jude's Day, and All Saints' Day. On each occasion Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung, with orchestra, the vocalists and instrumentalists numbering over seventy. The solos were taken by Master John Lacey and Master Percy Dawson (boys of the choir), and Mr. Reginald Groome. Matins, Holy Communion, and Evensong were sung to Smart in F, the anthem at Matins being Mr. E. H. Thorne's "All Thy works." Mr. Trickett presided at the organ, and Mr. Hamilton Robinson conducted.

The members of the St. Augustine's Musical Society, Highbury, gave their seventh Concert on the 17th ult., the first part consisting of Pattison's "Ancient Mariner," the second part being miscellaneous. The Cantata was exceedingly well rendered and much appreciated by a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Florence Monk, Miss Cribb, and Messrs. Herbert Nash and Henry Baker, who also gave solos in the second part; Miss Barton contributed a pianoforte solo, which was encored. Mr. Harold Wall accompanied, and Mr. Charles Strong conducted.

An excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given by the members of the Grosvenor Choral Society, at the Grosvenor Hall, before a crowded audience, on Friday, the 20th ult. (165th Monthly Concert). The soloists were Miss Patti Winter, Mrs. D. Woodhouse, Mr. T. P. Frame, and Mr. Frank May, all of whom were highly efficient. The choruses were rendered with much precision. Mr. T. P. Frame presided at the pianoforte, Mr. George Winny at the harmonium, and Mr. David Woodhouse conducted.

The projected Musical Society at Wood Green, to which we referred in our August number, and which has since been constituted under the style of the Noel Park Amateur Orchestral Society, gave a very successful first Concert at St. Mark's Mission House, Noel Park, on the 16th ult., with a well-chosen programme, consisting of orchestral pieces, and vocal and instrumental solo numbers. The band, which at present consists of some sixteen instrumentalists, was ably conducted by Mr. J. Sullens, the zealous promoter of the young society.

THE Concert given by the Preston Choral Society, (under the conductorship of Dr. Hiles), on the 14th ult., when Handel's Oratorio "Samson" was performed, a notice of which appears in our present number, was the first of four promised in the prospectus for the season 1885-86. At the second, on the 26th inst., Handel's "Messiah" will be given, and Cowen's Cantata "Sleeping Beauty" and Dvorak's Cantata, "The Spectre's Bride," will form the third Concert, to take place in February, 1886. The fourth Concert will be miscellaneous.

MR. JOHN FAUX BOARDMAN, Organist and Choirmaster at St. Saviour's Church, Herne Hill Road, gave his annual Concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on Friday evening, the 6th ult., before a crowded audience. The vocalists were Madame Adeline Paget, Miss Alice Patten, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Charles Chilley, and Mr. James Budd. Part-songs were sung by the church choir, under the careful conductorship of the bénéficiaire, an organ solo was played by Mr. Herbert Thorne, and Mr. John Harrison presided at the pianoforte.

THE first Lecture of the session was given at the College of Organists, on Tuesday evening, the 24th ult., by Mr. Samuel Gee, the subject being "The Spirit of the Liturgy, musically considered." Mr. E. H. Turpin occupied the chair.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. Malcolm Lawson, performed "Judas Maccabeus" on the roth ult., in Christ Church, Watney Street. The soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Miss Jessie Dixon, Mr. D'Arcy Ferris, and Mr. Robert Cubitt. The Choir also gave a performance of "Elijah" in St. Bride's Church, Fleet Street, on the ryth ult. The soloists were Miss Clara Hoschke, Mrs. Tuer, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Jabez West. Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ, on both occasions.

The Clapton Vocal Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Alfred W. Maycock, Henry Thom, Sidney C. Ratcliff, and Alex. H. S. Burnett, gave a very successful Concert on Tuesday, October 27, at the Manor Rooms, Hackney, the proceeds being in aid of the funds of the "Association for the Preservation of the River Lea"; president, the Lord Bishop of Bedford. Madame Bessie Webber, Miss Minnie Kirton, and Mr. H. P. Matthews were the vocalists; pianists, Mrs. W. M. Wait and Mr. Herbert Wait; Conductor and accompanist, Mr. W. M. Wait.

On Sunday evening, the 22nd ult., a Festival Service was held at St. Barnabas, Kensington, when Dr. Bridge's Oratorio "Mount Moriah," was admirably rendered by a largely increased choir, and an efficient professional orchestra. The soloists were Messra. Hilton and Dalzell, of Westminster Abbey, and Dr. Bridge conducted. Great credit must be given to Mr. C. Hopkins Ould, the Organist of the Church, who presided at the organ, for the manner in which the work was prepared and rendered.

THE Monthly Smoking Concert of the Victoria Glee Club was held at the Victoria Mansions Restaurant, Victoria Street, on Saturday, the 14th ult. The quartets, solos, and songs, were given by Messrs. W. Sexton, B. T. Waddams, G. T. Carter, Fred. Cozens, E. J. Bell, T. Distin, C. R. Bayley, and S. Kessell. Mr. James Hallé gave a pianoforte solo, and Messrs. J. Hallé and Frank Swinford were the accompanists. Mr. W. Sexton conducted.

The programme of the Cambridge University Musical Society's Concert on Wednesday, the 4th ult., contained A. C. Mackenzie's Quartet in E flat, which was favourably received by a cultivated audience, and Beethoven's Trio in C minor (Op. 9). The executants were Messrs. Stanford, Gompertz, Jung, and Brousil. Miss Amy Sherwin was the vocalist.

IN a Congregation holden at Oxford on Thursday, October 22, the following were admitted to the degree of Mus. Doc.: H. Walmsley Little, New College, and of Brixton Rise, S.W.; Charles J. Vincent, New College, and of Hampstead, N.W. Degree of Mus. Bac.: W. A. C. Cruickshank, New College; and T. Flemmings, New College.

An Organ Recital was given at the City Temple, on Thursday, the 19th ult., by Mr. E. H. Turpin. The vocalists were Miss Clara Dowle and Mr. Alexander Tucker, both of whom were very successful.

At the London Institution, Finsbury Circus, on Thursdays the 3rd and roth inst., Mr. Carl Armbruster, will give two lectures (completing the series) on the Musical Dramas of Richard Wagner, with illustrations.

Nachgelassene Lieder für eine Singstimme, mit Pianoforte begleitung. Von Franz Schubert. Revidirt und herausgegeben von Max Friedländer.

Schubert Album. Sammlung der Lieder für eine Singstimme, mit Pianoforte begleitung. Von Franz Schubert. Kritisch revidirt von Max Friedländer. Band I.

Schubert Album Supplement. Varianten und Revisions bericht zum ersten Bande der Lieder Von Franz Schubert, herausgegeben von Max Friedländer.

[Leipzig: C. F. Peters.]

THE magnificent and critical edition of Schubert's works now in course of issue by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, will put the world in possession at last of all that the Viennese master wrote, and astonish it with the sight of many treasures long lying in obscurity. Meanwhile, a welcome is deserved by the publication before us. This is a collection of twenty hitherto, we believe, unprinted songs. Looking at Schubert's eminence as a lyric composer, and the ineffable grace and charm that surround his Lieder, thousands of amateurs will turn over these pages with eagerness. We venture to say that they will not be disappointed, for though very few of the songs belong to the more important section of their class-the section adorned by the "Erl King" and the "Young Nun"-all are beautiful, with the beauty inseparable from Schubert's muse. The first book, containing ten songs, opens with an important setting of Schlegel's "Die Gebüsche," in the composer's freest vein, and marked by strong characteristics, against which must be set the monotony of continuous arpeggios in accompaniment. The second song, "Trost," though very brief, is made impressive by the power of its harmonies; while the third, "Minnelied," is as simple as a Volkslied. We next find some remarkable music to Goethe's "Geistesgruss," in which the admirers of Schubert will recognise the full power of his genius. This song is printed on a single page, and stands as an settings of verses from Goethe's "Claudine' von Villa Rella" follow, and are likely to become favourites with follow, and are likely to become favourites with tenor vocalists. A striking echo song, "Abschied," and some quite Schubertian music to Klopstock's "Furcht der Geliebten" are among the remaining contents of the first book. The second book opens with Jacobi's "Trauer der Liebe," set to music as simple in structure as it is pathetic in character. "Bei dem Grabe meines Vaters" follows in the same moving strain, though much more elaborate, the accompaniment having a more distinct function than usual, and being, indeed, something beyond accompaniment merely. The Volkslied character re-appears in an Abendlied, but we have something far higher in a setting of Albert Stadler's "Lieb Minna," which is full of artistic beauty. Passing over several songs which are scarcely up to the Schubert average, we find all the master's charm in "Am See," and especially in some verses of Schlegel entitled "Blanka." This ends the little collection, and does so worthily, for the composer's genius shines on every page. No information is given as to the period of Schubert's life in which these works were written. We are disposed to think that they are early productions, chiefly for the reason that the pianoforte part has, in no case, the importance bestowed upon it by the master in his later years. Its mission is that of accompaniment. But belong to what period they may, we are glad to possess them. It is to be hoped that the songs will soon appear with an adequate English version of the poetry.

By the publication of his "Schubert Album," Herr Peters anticipates the critical edition of Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, doing so, moreover, under conditions which make the issue one of special value. It is only by looking into the Supplement that we can get an idea of the large amount of research and patient thought brought to bear upon the Album by its editor. There we see that the history of each Lied had been traced out as far as possible, that careful comparison has been made between the original MS. where available, and the published editions, every variation down to the minutest being carefully noticed, and that evidences of the composer's occasional carelessness in setting down his thoughts have had due consideration. In these respects the Supplement is a model of its kind, and an invaluable addition to Schubert literature. When the issue is completed, admirers of the Viennese lyrist will have before them all there is to know regarding his matchless songs. In some cases the all is a great deal. Thus Herr Friedlander fills six pages with notes and music-type examples concerning the "Erl King." The "Wanderer" occupies four pages, and so on, in proportion to the importance of the theme. This is enough, we feel sure, to excite the curiosity of English amateurs, who will join with us in hoping that an English edition may be forthwith prepared. The Album, which embodies the result of the study indicated by the Supplement, can hardly need words of recommendation. It contains the twenty songs of "Die schöne Müllerin," the twenty-four of the "Winterreise," the fourteen of the "Schwanenge-sang," and twenty-two independent compositions, among them the "Erl King," the "Wanderer," the "Young Nun," the "Ave Maria," and the "Trout." The book is handsomely printed, and we look forward with pleasure to the issue of other instalments in an equally attractive and critical form.

Herzens Stimmen. Album of Six Songs. Translated from the German of Heine by Charles Hervey. Music by Arthur Hervey. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

By means of his Liebeslieder and other compositions of a similar character, Mr. Arthur Hervey has earned a right to respectful and sympathetic consideration whenever he comes forward with a new work. He is not a writer of English songs in the present case, but of lyrics cast in the German mould and permeated with the German spirit. It would seem that the composer's strength lies in giving this particular mode and tinge of expression to his thoughts. If that be so, he does well to persevere along the same course. The six songs before us present Mr. Hervey at his best, though it cannot be said that they are uniformly meritorious. The first—a setting of "Lehre deine Wang' an meine Wang"—is an excellent example of the composer's taste and skill; of the manner in which he can gain the desired expression by simplest means; and of the firmness with which he refuses to consider mere vocal display at the expense of æsthetic truth. The song will never be sung by an "artist" for the sake of the honour and glory he may obtain through it from the multitude. "Das Alte Lied" strikes us as less successful, owing to the needlessly varied character, in some places, of its rhythm. That of "Die Lotus Blume," on the other hand, is open to little objection, while the music has points of distinction such as connoisseurs will readily appreciate, and for which they will prize the piece. "Es leight der Hersse Sommer" may pair off with its immediate predecessor in all essential respects, but "Dein Angesicht" occupies a place apart for structural, as well as other reasons, and deserves to be regarded as a powerful example of the composer in a passionate mood. "Mag da drausen" is the longest and most elaborate of the set. It might almost be called a little scena, on account of the variety of its form and expression, and, assuredly, it brings the Album to a worthy end. Looking at the whole set, we are glad to welcome such real music from the hand of an Englishman. It is written for music's sake, and with a single eye to artistic expression. Would there were more of the same kind in the same form.

There's a woman like a dew-drop. Song. From the Tragedy "A Blot in the 'Scutcheon' by Robert Browning. Set to music by A. C. Mackenzie.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS song, composed for a performance of Mr. Browning's drama, deserves to live apart, as it assuredly will in the mind of those who can appreciate musical beauty in its highest form. Those who know Mr, Mackenzie's method cannot be surprised to hear that the song is not one to be sung and strummed with the facility favoured by an average English ballad. It demands from the executant, and even the hearer, something of the feeling and perceptiveness of the composer. That condition fulfilled, those who satisfy it are conscious of a work belonging to the highest class, in which power of conception is allied with elegance and distinction of expression. This implies that Mr. Mackenzie has proved himself a worthy colleague of the poet, whose lovely lines are indeed wedded to music as happily as though the match were one of "natural selection."

The Comprehensive Scale and Arpeggio Manual. By Walter Macfarren. [Edwin Ashdown.]

THIS Manual includes all scales and arpeggi required at the Metropolitan and Local Examinations of the Royal Academy of Music, and will therefore prove most valuable to the many who are preparing for this ordeal. The practice of technical Exercises has become so general in the present day that it is well we should adopt some uniform method, not only of fingering, but of the arrangement of major and minor scales, and especially that the "harmonic form of the minor scale should take precedence of that termed the "melodic," a system adopted throughout this work. The Manual comprises all the major and harmonic minor scales in similar and contrary motion; in thirds and sixths in similar motion, and, starting from the third and sixth, in contrary motion; the melodic minor in similar motion; the chromatic scale in precisely the same varied methods, and also in double minor thirds, double minor sixths, double major sixths, in complete chords of the sixth, of the diminished seventh, and in double octaves. The major and minor scales are also given in double thirds and double sixths; and arpeggi on the dominant and diminished sevenths. Many of these Exercises can be picked out of various books; but we know of no Manual so complete as this one. As we have already said, too, it is important as enforcing the necessity of practising the harmonic form of the minor scale, a method not even mentioned in Plaidy's well-known work.

Alfred Day's Treatise on Harmony. Edited, with an Appendix, by G. A. Macfarren, Mus. D., M.A., Cantab., et Mus. D., Oxon. [Harrison and Sons.]

THE original preface to this work, signed by Alfred Day, and dated in 1845, is reprinted in this edition, and adds to the interest of the book, not only as proving the number of years since the author first gave his theory to the world, but as illustrating, by a letter written in approval of the system by Sir George (then Mr.) Macfarren, in the same year, that in spite of the apathy with which the principles enunciated by Dr. Day were received by the majority of the professors of the day, one at least of the most able and conscientious theorists became convinced of their truth at that time, and has nobly shown the courage of his convictions by teaching, writing, and lecturing on the subject whenever and wherever an opportunity offered. Indeed, it may be asserted that the "Day theory" was mainly kept alive by the publication of "The Rudiments of Harmony," and "Six Lectures," of Sir George Macfarren, both of which works found their way into musical circles where Dr. Day's book was unknown. Considering that the Treatise under notice has been attacked and defended for forty years, there can be no reason here for doing more than express our satisfaction that a new edition of the work, so carefully edited, has at length been issued. Sir George Macfarren has written a Preface and an Appendix for the book, in the latter of which he makes some additions, and states a few differences of opinion, the result of the many years' practical experience of the system. The work is most attractively got up, and will assuredly command an extensive sale.

Fantasia for the Organ. In F major. By W. Spark. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS lengthy work first appeared in instalments in the Organist's Quarterly Fournal, and is here issued in its complete form. It is virtually a Sonata in scope and in the breadth and dignity of the treatment, although the plan of the movements is somewhat irregular. To a bright and genial Allegro moderato succeeds an Andante espressivo in A flat, based on a Spohr-like subject. On the other hand, the very energetic finale suggests the influence of the corresponding movement of Mendelssohn's Sonata in F, especially the concluding bars. On page 9, bar 11, Dr. Spark has inadvertently written consecutive fifths, and in the fifth bar before the end there is a quaver too much.

Four Christmas Carols. Edited by James Baden Powell. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No. r of these seasonable compositions is by Mr. Alfred King, No. 2 by J. E. Vernham, and Nos. 3 and 4 by the editor. We prefer the latter as possessing more of the characteristics of Christmas music than the others. The cadence at the close of the first half of No. 4 is particularly quaint. The first and second are more in the style of ordinary hymn tunes, but bright and therefore suitable enough for the verses.

The Office of the Holy Communion, in B flat. By Cedric Bucknall. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This extremely fine setting includes every portion of the Communion Service that is usually sung, and also the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei. Mr. Bucknall is evidently effective, but even original. Perhaps the best portion is the Nicene Creed, in which the harmonies and the accompaniment are strikingly bold, yet always in keeping with the requirements of the church. No more meritorious version has come under our notice for some time. In the matters of correct accent, phrasing, &c., the composer is also very careful, and choirmasters cannot fail to be pleased with his service.

Lullaby. For violin, with pianoforte accompaniment. Composed by T. E. Gatehouse. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE excessive simplicity of this little piece absolves us from any lengthy criticism upon its merits. The subjects are tuneful, and the Musette, in the subdominant, gives effect to the return of the original theme. We shall be glad to see something of more importance from so modest and unassuming a composer.

Un Rêve de Bonheur. Sketch for the Pianoforte. Composed by Albert Lowe. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

As this graceful little Sketch has been played by the pupils of several English Schools of Music, we could wish that the translated title, "A Dream of Happiness," had been the only one on the title-page. It is a musicianlike composition; and apart from its intrinsic merit as a melodious drawing-room piece, will prove useful to young players for the cultivation of touch.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, for men's voices, in E flat. By H. Davan Wetton. [Novello, Ewer & Co.]

As we remarked a few months ago, a demand is arising for service music arranged for men's voices only, and Mr. Wetton's setting, composed for the Westminster Abbey choir, is worthy of commendation. It is written in a smooth, dignified, church-like style, but it is by no means dry or monotonous.

Easy Two-Part Songs for Ladies' or Boys' Voices. By Myles B. Foster. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of these charming little pieces has recognised the fact that music expressly intended for schools need not be puerile or unworthy of consideration from an art standpoint. Though he never forgets the necessity for straightforwardness and simplicity, he has contrived to impart a pleasant feeling of musicianship to his trifles which greatly enhances their abstract merit, and even their general effectiveness. The part-songs are four in number, and all of them are equal in attractive qualities.

FOREIGN NOTES.

HERR WILHELM TAPPERT, the Berlin musical savant, has published an interesting vade mecum to the seven historical Pianoforte Recitals of Anton Rubinstein, already referred to in these columns. Respecting these Herr Alexander Moszkowski writes in the Deutsches Montags Blatt: "There can be no doubt that the demand made by Rubinstein upon the mental endurance of his audience is an enormous one, but then his purpose also is altogether exceptional. He is not concerned about raising a memorial to any individual composer by a unique artistic effort, neither does he make propaganda of any sort for some particular school of the art. His Sonata-evening only forms a link in the chain of Concerts, the object of which is nothing less than an illustration of the historical development of pianoforte music in its entirety; a programme unheard of in its dimensions and which could only have been conceived by the greatest of all pianoforte giants. The Rubinstein series may indeed be looked upon as a music festival on a large scale; as an event which will leave its mark behind it; as an artistic deed of the greatest significance and which will most likely never be equalled. Rubinstein intends to close his career as pianoforte player with this cycle of performances, and although this is not the first time that similar rumours of his retirement have prevailed, we have every reason to believe in their being verified after this truly monumental effort has been finally accom-plished."

On the 4th ult., the anniversary of the death of Men-Benedictus and the Agnus Dei. Mr. Bucknall is evidently delssohn, a highly effective performance of Sophocles' a musician of great talent, his ideas being often not only drama "Antigone" was given at the Leipzig StadtTheater, with the added music from the pen of the late master. The choruses were, it is said, exceedingly well rendered, and, together with the admirable acting of Frau Lewinsky, who represented Antigone, produced a great impression. The work had not been performed at Leipzig for over thirty years.

The Royal Orchestra of Berlin commemorated, on the 5th ult., the fiftieth anniversary of his entry into the profession of their former conductor, Herr W. Taubert, by a performance devoted entirely to compositions by that veteran master. Among the numbers more especially appreciated by the assembly were those appertaining to the incidental music to Shakespeare's "Tempest." There was no lack of floral ovations to mark the occasion, Herr Taubert (who is now in his seventy-fifth year), himself conducting, and the Emperor William honouring the performance with his presence.

The centenary of the birth of Friedrich Schneider, the meritorious composer of oratorios and theoretical author, is to be celebrated next month, both at Chemnitz and at Dessau, by the performance respectively of the Oratorios, "Das Weltgericht" and "Absalon." The Conductor at the former place will be the composer's son, Theodor Schneider, and at Dessau, Herr August Klughardt will wield the bâton.

The Meiningen orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Hans von Bülow, is just now engaged upon a Concert tour, accompanied by Johannes Brahms, whose new Symphony is being thus introduced to audiences in various parts of Germany and Holland.

First performances have recently taken place of Wagner's "Die Walküre," at Hanover, and of the same master's "Siegfried," at Dresden, amidst the enthusiastic demonstrations of the auditors.

The Theatre of Mannheim must now be added to the list of German operatic stages on which Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" has been produced in its entirety.

A monument is to be unveiled next year at Pressburg, his native town, to Johann Nepomuk Hummel, the pupil of Mozart, and one of the most influential leaders in the development of modern pianoforte playing, as well as an esteemed composer for that instrument.

At the Berlin opera, two operatic works by contemporary French composers will be produced during the present season—viz., Joncières' "Le Chevalier Jean," and Poise's "Joli Gilles." The former will also shortly be performed, for the first time in Germany, at the Cologne Stadt-Theater.

The Italian Opera season at the Berlin Krolls'che Theater has already concluded, the representations having lasted only one month.

A youthful pianist, ten years of age, has recently created much interest at a Concert given by him at Frankfurt, where he played from memory difficult pieces by Chopin, Liszt, and others. His name is Ernest Schilling, and he is a pupil of the Paris Conservatoire.

The first musical event of the season at Cologne has been the production, at the Gürzenich, of Berlioz's "Requiem," under the direction of Professor Wüllner. The German musical press teems with enthusiastic reports concerning the work and its masterly performance.

Among the gifts bestowed upon Dr. Reinecke, on the occasion of his recent jubilee (referred to in our last number) has been a purse containing over 50,000 marks, which sum that artist has generously handed over to the Musicians' Fund of the Gewandhaus Orchestra.

Herr Heinrich Zöllner, favourably known in Germany as a composer of vocal music, has been elected to the conductorship of the celebrated Cologne Männergesang Verein, vacated by the retirement of Herr S. de Lange.

A young English singer, Miss Huff, has made a most successful début in Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon," at the Lübeck Stadt-Theater, and continues to attract the enthusiastic notice of amateurs. It is said that Mr. Carl Rosa is anxious to secure the lady for his company.

Another has been added to the several existing German renderings of the libretto of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," the original one, which is still in use on most German stages, being a most unworthy production. A very acceptable version was published some years ago by the late Herr Bitter, and the present translator, Herr Max Kalbeck, of Vienna, is said to have handled Da Ponte's verses still more skilfully. It only remains, then, that one or the other should be adopted, and Mozart's masterpiece, freed from association with such absurdities as, for instance, the rendering of Leforello's awe-inspired address to the statue—"O statua gentilissima del gran commendatore"—into the farcical lines:

which, indeed, is by no means the worst example that might be quoted.

The four hundredth performance of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was recorded last month at the Frankfurt Stadt. Theater, where that great work was first produced in January, 1794, and was then described on the playbills as "a comic operetta, in two acts, from the Italian, the music by Mozart."

Madame Viardot-Garcia, who is the possessor of the original manuscript score of "Don Giovanni," has signified her willingness to dispose of this precious document, and to hand over the sum realised to a fund now being raised for the projected Mozart statue at Vienna.

The German Opera at Rotterdam celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its establishment in the music-loving Dutch city, on October 22, with a performance of Mozart's "Don Juan," preceded by a festive prologue and a spirited execution of Weber's "Jubilee" Overture. Herr Behrens is the present director of the Institution, which appears to be continuing in a flourishing condition.

The Rotterdam Society "tot Bewoordering der Toon-

The Rotterdam Society "tot Bevoordering der Toon-kunst," under the direction of Herr Gernsheim, contemplates the performance, during the present season, of the following important works, viz.:—Oratorio, "Paradise Lost" (Rubinstein); last act of "Parsifal" (Wagner); Ninth Symphony (Beethoven); Passion Music, "St. Matthew" (Bach); a sufficient proof of the activity of this institution.

A Grétry Museum is about to be formed at Liège, the composer's native town, which is to combine interesting relics and other curiosa relative to that master.

At a recent meeting of the directors of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, at Vienna. Prince Richard Metternich and Baron Bezeeny were unanimously elected president and vice-president respectively of that famous institution. The last-named gentleman is also the successor of Baron Hoffmann as Intendant-general of the Imperial Opera.

The opening of the International Conference on the question of "Musical Pitch," took place at Vienna, on the 16th of last month. Among the gentlemen appointed to attend on behalf of the German Government, are Professor Joachim, of Berlin, and Dr. Wüllner, of Cologne.

Herr Carl Goldmark, the Austrian composer, is putting the finishing touches to a new opera entitled "Merlin," which is to be first produced at the Vienna Hof-Theater next year.

Dr. Hanslick, in a recent number of the Neue Freie Presse, of Vienna, relates an amusing story illustrative of the popularity in the Austrian capital of the music of Johann Strauss. In a suburb of Vienna there lived a wellto-do burgher woman, whose greatest pleasure it was to listen to Strauss's dance music. In all situations of her life, she would often tell her friends, it had cheered her and given her comfort. And when she came to die, it was her expressed wish that on the day of her burial the Strauss orchestra should play by her grave's side her favourite valses. In her will also she had made the same stipulation, and had provided moreover that everyone of the musicians should receive one ducat for his pains. There was no choice, then, but to obey the good woman's behests as far as it was possible so to do. Consequently, on the morning appointed for the funeral, Strauss and his inspiring band appeared at the house of mourning, and there, previous to the deceased's remains being conveyed to the hearse, played through, from beginning to end, a suite of valses, so that the good woman's last wishes should be carried out and her lively spirit set at rest. Dr. Hanslick, we may add, vouches for the accuracy of this story, which he communicates to his readers as "a contribution to Strauss's biography and a psychological illustration of the character of the Viennese people.'

Johann Strauss's new operetta, entitled "Die Zigeunerbraut" (The Gipsy Bride), has met with so favourable a reception at the Theatre "An der Wien" that it is likely to occupy the stage of that institution for some time to come.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" has been most enthusiastically received on its recent first performance at the German Theatre of Prague, whereof Herr Angelo Neumann is the director.

Anton Rubinstein's opera "The Demon" was lately produced for the first time at the Theatre of Prague, and achieved a decided success.

A third and completely revised edition of Dr. Rieman's excellent "Musik Lexikon" (reviewed by us at the time of its first publication) is being prepared by its author, and will be published during the coming year.

The newly founded Liszt Society, at Leipzig, has been placed under the protectorate of the Grand Duke of Weimar.

A French edition of all the known letters of Beethoven is being prepared by Professor Nohl, of Heidelberg, on behalf of a Paris publisher.

Calmann Lévy, of Paris, has just published a new volume from the pen of M. Arthur Pougin, entitled Verdi, histoire anecdotique de sa vie et de ses œuvres. The Paris Châtelet Concerts, under the direction of M. Colonne, commenced their twelfth season on October 25, when the programme included Beethoven's C minor Symphony and "Prometheus" music, as well as compositions by Saint-Saëns, Lalo, and Massenet. M. Lamoureux's Concerts Symphoniques et Dramatiques are being held this year at the Eden Theatre, and commenced on the 8th ult. at the Grand Opera the hundredth performance took place, last month, of the graceful ballet "Coppelia." The personnel of soloists at that institution during the present season consists of twelve leading lady singers, ten tenors, five baritones, and nine basses. Among new works to be produced during the season only two are definitely decided upon—viz., M. Massenet's "Cid" and a ballet whereto M. Messager has written the music.

Of the 238 candidates for admission to the vocal section of the Paris Conservatoire this year, only thirty—viz., thirteen gentlemen and seventeen ladies, have been suc-

M. Adolphe Samuel has been awarded the prize of 1,000 francs offered by the Belgian Academy of Fine Arts for the composition of a string quartet.

A company of Russian vocalists, numbering forty members of both sexes, under the direction of M. d'Agreneff, have lately created much interest by their performances in Berlin musical circles. The singers appear in their national costumes, and their programmes consist entirely of national Slavonic songs, some of which are said to date back as far as the eleventh century. Their voices are good, and their

Verdi has recently celebrated, at his villa, Busseto, the seventy-fourth anniversary of his birth. Friends and admirers had come from all parts of Italy to do homage to the veteran Maëstro, who, upon being questioned as to the progress of his new opera "Iago," is said to have replied: "I fear I shall not be able to complete the work, At my time of life, when one no longer can feel the pangs of jealousy, it is a hazardous matter to attempt to express them musically.'

fied their intention of being present.
Signor Giuseppe Lamperti, the impresario of the Apollo Theatre at Rome, is in negotiation with Herr Anton Schott, the Wagner tenor, with a view to the production at that Theatre of "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin."

An "Estudiantina" has recently been formed at Milan, in emulation of the well-known Spanish fraternity of that title, and consisting of mandolinists, guitarists, and violinists. The new Society has recently given a highly successful first Concert, in aid of charity, at the Teatro Milanese.

At the Teatro Carcano, of Milan, a new opera, entitled "Adelia," by the Maëstro Filippo Sangiorgi, has recently been performed for the first time, and met with great success. A performance on a grand scale is to be given, at Rome, of Spontini's opera "Olympia." An opera by an as yet little known Maëstro, Signor Emilio Pizzi, has been accepted for performance at the Theatre La Scala, of Milan. The new work is entitled "La Rupe degli Amanti."

At Madrid two one-act operettas have been successfully produced—viz., at the Theatre Martin, "La Divina Zarzuela," by Señor Llanos; and at the Variétés, "El Hijo de su Papa," the libretto by Señor Flores Garcia, the music by Señor Blasco.

The Union artistico-musicale of Madrid has organised a series of Popular Concerts of classical music at one of the theatres of the Spanish capital during this winter.

A new opera by a Portuguese composer, Senhor Sauvinet, entitled "Flavia," is to be shortly produced at the San Carlos Theatre, of Lisbon, where great expectations have been raised concerning this première.

Madame Sophie Menter, who is just now engaged upon a Concert tour in Sweden and Norway, will shortly return to St. Petersburg in order to discharge her duties as professor at the Conservatoire.

A complete Opera entitled "Romeo and Juliet," has been found amongst the papers of the late Dr. Damrosch, the founder of the New York German Opera. The work is said to have been composed in the year 1862, when the deceased musician was the Conductor at the Opera of Breslau.

At Dresden died on October 22, Albin Wieck, a brother of Madame Clara Schumann, and, like his father, Friedrich Wieck, a highly esteemed musical professor at the Saxon capital. He was born in 1821, and commenced his career as violinist in the Imperial orchestra at St. Petersburg, which post he quitted in 1859, and having settled in Dresden, he became the faithful exponent, both practically, by his teaching, and theoretically, by the publication of several books, of the method of pianoforte playing, initiated with such conspicuous success by his

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-In what sense can it be true that the tonality of the minor mode is less clearly defined than that of the major? At this time of day it is surely a mistake to regard the former as in any way subordinate to the latter, even from a harmonic point of view. But for the deplorable fact that the minor scales are still destitute of proper signatures, I think no musician could entertain such an

Mr. Goddard reminds me that the minor scale is variable. But in only one (and that the most unusual) of its several forms is the tritone between the supertonic and superdominant not to be found.—Faithfully yours,

THE ST. GEORGE'S GLEE UNION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-In a paragraph, on page 672 of the November number of your paper, relating to the 200th consecutive Monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union, it is stated that, "as far as can be ascertained, the St. George's Glee Union is the only Musical Society in London which has had such a long and successful career." This Society, it is said, was formed in 1869. Permit me to inform you the Southwark Choral Society was started in 1856, and is still carrying on a successful career under the management of the original Conductor and Secretary. There is also a Southville Choral Society, founded in 1858.

Yours obediently, J. COURTNAY.

À L'EDITEUR DU "MUSICAL TIMES."

Monsieur,-Je lis dans le Nr. 513, pag. 680, de votre journal, une letter de Mr. Charles Edwards, par laquelle il demande si quelqu'un peut lui donner des renseignements sur l'auteur d'un violoncelle marqué, d'après lui: "F. Fillement, père, à Crémone.'

D'abord, je pense que Mr. Charles Edwards se trompe en écrivant "Fillement." C'est "Pillement" qu'il faut lire; mais je sais que la marque, au fer rouge, est faite de façon à favoriser l'erreur.

Le père Pillement, comme on le nomme dans le commerce de la lutherie, était originaire de Mirecourt (Vosges, France), la patrie de presque tous les luthiers français. Il travaillait à la fin du dernier siècle, et peutêtre encore au commencement du XIXme. et a laissé beaucoup d'instruments.

L'expression "A. Crémone" n'est autre chose que l'enseigne de sa boutique, car il ne travaillait pas même à Paris, m'a-t-on assuré; mais à Mirecourt, et se con-tentait de signer ses violons de Paris. Ses instruments n'ont jamais eu une grande réputation, et cependant, on en trouve parmi une de bons, et même d'excellents. Il n'y a pas plus de deux ans, je lisais dans un journal musical qu'un artiste de renom, en tournées et possesseur d'un excellent violon Italien, exécutait presque toujours dans les concerts sur un Pillement dont-il faisait beaucoup de cas. J'ai vu des instruments de Pillement, bien construits (et notamment de violoncelles), d'un bois sain et d'une soupe correcte, ils étaient épais de bois, et avaient du son quoique de petit patron.

AMERICAN SPRUCE TREE VIOLINS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,-In last month's Journal you reported the results of an examination of the violins made from wood of the American spruce tree. May not the fine tone of these instruments result from the drying of the wood by the American process, noticed in a recent number of the Daily Telegraph. If not, would it not be a good experiment to try the quality of tone of instruments made with the customary hard wood backs and pine bellies, when dried by this American process?

Adopting the words at the conclusion of the article, I suggest that violin making is one of the industries to which this scientific aid can be opportunely applied; for by fashioning the backs and bellies mechanically to an approximate size and thickness, drying them by this American process, afterwards guaging their thickness, and finishing them by hand in the usual mode, cheap instruments may be made.

There is, I believe, a good demand for new violins at the present time, and the prices asked for really fine instruments. as we saw at the late Inventions Exhibition, are extravagant .- I am, Sir, yours truly,

Kingstron-on-Thankers.—On the evening of Wednesday, the 4th wilt, a Concert was given in the Albany Hall in aid of the building flund of the Surbiton Swimming Club, when a land excellent programme was excellently rendered. The vocalists of the Worrell, Miss Cockburn, and Madame Raymond, Messra, Dalrell and Horscroft, all of whom were highly successful in their songs, Mr. George Raiement, a well-known elocutionist, gave great satisfaction with his recitations; Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (violin), and Miss Marian Davis (planoforte), being also very favourably received. The accompaniments were admirably performed by Mr. John Harrison. The organisation of the Concert was entirely due to Madame Raymond, who is to be congratulated on securing the services of artists which rendered this one of the best entertainment given in the Albany Hall for a long time past.

LEIGHTON BUZZARD.—Mr. Sinclair Dunn gave an entertainment, entitled "Songs of Britain and Wales," under the auspices of the Working Men's Club and Inastitute, in the Corn Exchange, on the 3rd ult. He was assisted by Miss Susetta Fenn, who, in addition to contributing several songs, accompanied with much ability. Mr. Dunn's characteristic vocal pieces were well received, and many warmly encored.

LLANRILE.—At All Saints' Church, the Dedication Festival—Feast of All Saints'—has been held during the past month. At all the Sunday services, and each daily Evensong, very large congregations assembled; and on the Friday evening, when Mendelssohn's Hear my Pager was sung, hundreds of people were unable to obtain admission. The whole of the services were well rendered.

LONDONDERRY.—On Tuesday, the 10th ult., the first of a series of Organ Recitals, in aid of the Organ Improvement Fund, was given in the Cathedral by the Organist, Mr. D. C. Jones, F.C.O. There was a crowded congregation. The programme was excellently selected, and included vocal solos, well rendered by Mr. Hemingway, principal bass of the Cathedral.

The principal vocalists were Madame Shepherd, Miss Fickering, Mr. T. E. Gledhill, and Messrs, Johnstone and Taylor, all of whom were well received. The choruses were given with much spirit. Herr Dannbruann led the band; Messrs. Brooks and Scott were the accompanists, and Mr. James Croxier was an efficient Conductor.

New York.—The St. George's Glee Club, a male quartet (A.T.T.B.), organised at the close of last season for the revival and maintenance of the old English glees, has already established itself as a permanent musical organisation. It is believed to be the only quartet in the country with the English combination of male alto, two tenors, and bass; and after singing with much success in Philadelphia and Boston, it is now intended to give three Subscription Concerts in New York. The Club is composed of W. Mahoney, alto; H. R. Humphries, first tenor; G.H. Dexter, second tenor; and E. Cholmeley-Jones, bass.—Haydn's Oratorio the Creation was sung by the Choir of St. John's Chapel (Trinity Parish) at the last Festival Service, on Sunday evening, October 4. The soloists were Dr. Martin, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, and Masters Felix Wendelschaefer and George Chapman. Mr. Geo. F. le Jeune, director.

Norwith-Much interest was excited by the Concert given at St. Andrew's Hall, on the 12th ult., in aid of the Jenny Lind Infirmary for Sick Children, the services of Madame Albani, Miss Damian, Mr. Santley, Mr. Lloyd, Lady Benedict (planoforte), Herr Carl Walther (violin), and Dr. Bunnett (organ), having been kindly volunteered on the occasion. The room was crowded, and the generous ald given by the artists mentioned was gracefully acknowledged by the Mayor of the City (Mr. John Gurney), a compliment cordially seconded by the enthusiastic applause of the audience.

OLDHAM.—The distribution of prizes to successful candidates, granted by the Society of Professional Musicians (North-Western Section), took place in the Town Hall on the 14th ult., under the presidency of the Mayor, who gave an excellent introductory address. After Mr. S. R. Platt had distributed the certificates, Dr. Hiles made an eloquent speech, in which he advocated the importance of considering music as one of the essential points in an English education, and impressed upon his hearers the desirability of forming classes for the study of stringed instruments. Dr. Horton Allison moved a resolution, declaring that, in the opinion of the meeting, the Society of Professional Musicians had promoted the cause of music by fostering united action amongst the professors of the art, and was consequently worthy of public support. This resolution was seconded by Dr. Dali, PARSONSTOWN, IRELAND.—The annual Harvest Thanksgiving services were held in the Parish Church, on Tuesday, the 3rd ult. The anthem was "Ye shall dwell" (Stainer). The choir sang with precision, especially in the Psalms and anthem. The Rev. W. Burroughs, Kingstown, preached in the morning, and the Right Rev. Lord Bishop of Killaloe in the evening, to large congregations. Mr. Vincent Syles, A. Mus., T.C.L., organist, &c., conducted, and played as voluntaries, Handel; Cantilène Pastorale, Melody, and Grand Chorus in D, Guillmant.

"Ruth'is a work of sterling power; its musical form is that of perfect tunefulness combined with simplicity and strength. There is nothing involved about it, nor the least straining after unattainable effects. The composer has grasped his theme in a thoroughly sympathetic manner, and has produced a work which is worthy of the subject... One of the sweetest numbers in the Cantata is Ruth's solo, 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' which is instinct with pathetic expression... Boaz's solo, 'Go not from hence, my daughter,' is another effective number... A choral, 'Nightfall,' is an exquisitely beautiful conception; and the intermezzo, 'Daybreak,' and the jubilant Wedding Chorus which follows, are full of spirit and vivacity, rushing forward with a joyous bound that carries the audience completely away. An enthusiastic encore was given to the intermezzo and chorus."—Bradford Observer.

ford Observer.

"That the idyllic story of Ruth is one admirably adapted for artistic illustration is unquestionable, and poets, painters, and musicians have over and over again made it a subject for the exercise of their talents, and we have no hesitation in saying that in its poetical and musical treatment by Mr. Oxandrod and our townsman, it has been invested with increased interest. . . . Pieces such as Mr. Gaul's Opus 34 are much wanted, and we helieve that when the 'Ruth' Cantata is heard in our Town Hall it will be at once accepted as a valuable addition to our stock of music suitable for performance by fairly advanced and advancing societies."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Beinks unoful, fresh and musicianis—this work will be a great

"Bright, tuneful, fresh, and musicianly—this work will be a great favourite, and will add to Mr. Gaul's reputation. The second part will be liked better than the first. It opens in the harvest-field, and here the real idyll begins, and with it the charm and grace and freshness of Mr. Gaul's inspiration. The maidens' chorus, bright as the morning it greets, and the men's robust and vigorous reply, well introduce the fresh and meloidous joy-breathing music of Ruth, the chastened yet hopeful address of Naomi, and the hearty generous velcome of Boaz.

The work closes with a short but spirited chorus, 'Rejoice, for the control of the state of the control of considerable freshness and vigoru."—Birmingham Weekly Dart.

Although somewhat simple in parts, it contains some charming music, and is highly characteristic of the story it so vividly illustrates."— South Wilts Express.

THE HOLY CITY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

"The work is an honour to English Art, and has elevated its composer into a place of distinction amongst native musicians."—Queen.
"A good sound musical work is this 'Holy City.' I have no hesitation in saying that it creditably represents English art, and does honour not only to the skill but to the judgment and taste of Mr. Gaul."—Daily Telegraph.
"The reception was favourable in the extreme, and the Cantata must henceforth be classed among the successes which the Birmingham Musical Festivals have brought to light."—Standars.
"The Holy City 'is evidently the work of a thoughtful as well as a clever composer, and should make its mark among thoroughly English productions of a sacred character."—Musical Times.
"We hope and believe that the reception given last night to Mr. Gaul and to his 'Holy City' Cantata will prove an earnest of its popularity and acceptance throughout the length and breadth of the land."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.
"A most interesting, tuneful, and scholarly work."—Manchester Courier.

THE MONTHS

MUSIC DY

"There are in this series of duets the sweetest things of the kind we have ever met with. No. 4, 'April,' and No. 5, 'May,' are our special favourites, the one being delightfully playful, the other tenderly melodious. Things to be treasured in households where sisters or friends delight in joining voices. The pianoforte accompaniments are well written, and such as an ordinary pianist may successfully undertake."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.
